Ward, Ward & Ward, of San Diego, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. By this action plaintiff seeks to recover $2,354.92 from the defendants, executors of the estate of Edwin Ferris, deceased, for work, labor, and services performed and supplies furnished to said Ferris, at his special instance.

The answer of defendants to plaintiff's third amended complaint, after admitting formal parts only, denied each and every material allegation thereof, and set up an alleged agreement under and by virtue of which plaintiff performed the work and furnished the materials, etc., for which he now seeks pay, asserting that said decedent, Ferris, had paid plaintiff in full for all said service. We think it unnecessary to recite in detail the terms of this alleged agreement. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Findings were expressly waived. Judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $102.92. There was no motion for a new trial. The appeal is from the judgment, by the so-called "alternative method."

We have read the entire record, consisting, as it does, of the clerk's transcript and reporter's transcript, also appellant's opening brief and respondents' answering brief, from which it appears that both parties hereto seek a reversal of the judgment.

[1] Appellant in his brief says:

"Under section 4½ of the Constitution of the state of California, and when it appears from the whole of the record in a case on appeal that substantial justice should be done, the appellant asks this appellate court, without having to undergo the expense and necessity of another trial herein, that this court find for plaintiff the amount which is justly due him in this case."

Much as we might desire to comply with the foregoing interesting request, the answer is that the court is without jurisdiction to grant it. Section 4, art. 6, Const. A large portion of the amount claimed by plaintiff as aforesaid was for the services of his wife as nurse for deceased at the latter's special instance and request, and in order to prove the allegations of his complaint as to such services, plaintiff offered his wife, Minnie E. Bayless, as a witness in his behalf, whose testimony, if received, would have tended to show such allegations to be true. To the testimony of this witness the following objection was interposed:

"We object to this witness testifying as to the transactions had with the decedent on the same ground, that of section — subdivision 3 of section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This witness is not, of course, the nominal party, but the section is broader than to exclude nominal parties; it excludes not only parties or assignors of parties, it also includes—excludes persons in whose behalf the action is prosecuted. Now, of course the testimony has not progressed far enough to show, but the pleadings indicate so clearly, the nature of the claim being presented against this estate, it is for services rendered, a larger part is a claim for services of this witness, as a member of the community of which she and the plaintiff are members, and by the same reasoning and on the same theory the testimony of this witness is also incompetent."

This objection was at first overruled, but later, and after the witness had testified fully, the ruling, so far as it relates to that portion of the witness' testimony in reference to plaintiff's claim for her services as nurse, was set aside, and the objection thereupon sustained. It is claimed by appellant that this ruling was erroneous, and we think the contention must be sustained.

[2, 3] That the earnings of the wife in such a case as this are community property is too well settled to require the citation of authorities. Such being the case, we think that where a husband is suing for services rendered by his wife, his claim is not derived from her, since he is entitled to the value of her services by virtue of his marital rights, and she, therefore, is a competent witness for him. 40 Cyc. 2295; Porter v. Dunn, 131 N.

Y. 314, 30 N. E. 122; Hopkins v. Clark, 90 Hun, 4, 35 N. Y. Supp. 360; Hiskett v. Bozarth, 75 Neb. 70, 105 N. W. 990; Parker v. Wells, 68 Neb. 647, 94 N. W. 717; Miller v. Miller, 7 Ariz. 316, 64 Pac. 415; Cullen v. Bisbee, 168 Cal. 695, 144 Pac. 968.

[4] Nor do we think that it is intended by this section to extend the disqualification to any except parties or assignors of parties. Todd v. Martin, 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 805, 37 Pac. 872.

[5] If it be contended in this case that should plaintiff recover, the wife would by that fact be interested in the result because of the fruits of such recovery being community property, the answer, as we see it, is that in legal contemplation she would not be invested with any legal interest therein. In the case of Lucas v. McDonald, 126 Iowa, 678, 102 N. W. 532, the Supreme Court of Iowa held that while the statute provided that "no party to an action, or the wife of such party, shall be examined as a witness in regard to any personal transaction between such witness and a person since deceased, as against the administrator of such deceased person," still, it not appearing that the wife had any part therein, in such a case she was a competent witness. Such cases as we have found holding to the contrary are predicated upon statutes differing in various respects from ours.

For these reasons we think the ruling referred to was prejudicial.

Judgment reversed.

WOODSTONE MARBLE & TILE CO. v.
DUNSMORE CANYON WATER CO.
et al. (Civ. 3249.)

Division 1, California. April 12, 1920.)

1. Corporations ⇨122—Buyer at execution sale of stock of mutual water corporation does not necessarily acquire title.

The rule that a buyer of corporate stock at a sale under execution acquires absolute title, if the stock stood on the corporate books in the name of the judgment debtor and the buyer had no notice of the claim of another, does not apply to stock of a mutual water corporation not organized for profit but merely to supply water to stockholders.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1)—Water right held appurtenant to land, though represented by stock in mutual company.

Where the owners of water rights appurtenant to their several tracts of land formed a mutual corporation and transferred their water rights to the corporation in exchange for stock representing the right to water, the water right remained appurtenant to the land notwithstanding the formal change in ownership and passed to a mortgagee of the land and appurtenant water rights as against a subsequent execution buyer of the stock which still stood on the corporate books in the name of the mortgagor.

3. Appeal and error ⇨909(1)—Compliance with statute making water stock appurtenant to land presumed to support judgment.

In the absence of anything in the record, it will be presumed that a water corporation complied with the requirements of Civ. Code, § 324, to make its stock appurtenant to the lands, if that is necessary to support the court's conclusion that the stock was appurtenant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Woodstone Marble & Tile Company against the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company, William Garland, and others, in which William Garland was the only defendant who appeared and answered. Judgment for defendant Garland, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Barstow, Rohe & Jeffers, of Los Angeles (C. E. Spencer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, Le Roy M. Edwards, and G. Harold Janeway, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought a decree adjudging it to be the owner of ten shares of stock in the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company and an order requiring said company to issue to it a certificate for the same.

The Dunsmore Canyon Water Company, together with Mrs. John Leenhouts and her husband, who were made parties defendant, suffered default. Defendant Garland filed an answer, and the result of the trial was a judgment against the plaintiff, from which it appeals on the judgment roll, claiming that it is entitled to have judgment in its favor entered upon the findings.

The facts as disclosed by the findings, are in substance as follows: In 1886 one Briggs, being the owner of 900 acres of land and the right to use thereon $\frac{90}{110}$ of all the waters of Dunsmore Canyon, subdivided the same into 90 ten-acre parcels under the name of Crescenta-Canada tract, which parcels he sold and conveyed, together with the right to $\frac{1}{110}$ of the said waters of Dunsmore Canyon as an appurtenance to each of said ten-acre parcels of land. In 1908 Mrs. Leenhouts, by mesne conveyance, acquired lot 1, block K, of this subdivision, with which there was conveyed to her as an appurtenance thereto $\frac{1}{110}$ of all the waters of Dunsmore Canyon, which supply of water, in the cultivation of said land and the irrigation of the same in growing fruits and other crops, was used thereon from 1886 to the bringing of this action, and without which said land would be of little or no value for the growing of crops thereon. In the year 1908 certain owners of these ten-acre tracts of land and the rights to the waters of Dunsmore Canyon so acquired as appurtenant thereto, organized a mutual water company, designated the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company, the purpose of which was to facilitate the collection, management, and distribution of the waters of said canyon to the owners of said lands in proportion to their respective rights to said waters; that thereupon Mrs. Leenhouts, as owner of said lot 1, block K, in said tract, and other property owners likewise having interest in the waters of said canyon, conveyed the same to the said corporation, and, as consideration for such conveyance, immediately received shares of the capital stock of said company in proportion to their original rights to the waters of Dunsmore Canyon which had theretofore been conveyed to them as an appurtenance to their lands, there being issued to Mrs. Leenhouts the ten shares of stock in controversy; that said water company is a mutual water company, and, without payment of dividends or profits, distributes the waters to its stockholders in proportion to the number of shares possessed by each; that defendant Garland acquired title to said lot 1, block K, by purchase at a sale duly made upon the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Mrs. Leenhouts as owner, whereby she mortgaged to him said lot, consisting of ten acres of land, "together with all and singular the * * * water and water rights, pipes, flumes and ditches thereunto belonging"; that at the time of the execution of said mortgage and the sale so made under foreclosure, followed by the execution of a deed to said property, the ten shares of stock in question stood upon the books of said company in the name of Mrs. Leenhouts, and no mention of the stock as such was made in the mortgage and no transfer or delivery thereof was made to the mortgagee. In an action brought against Mrs. Leenhouts by plaintiff, it caused the stock of which she, as shown by the stock books of said company, appeared to be the unconditional owner, to be attached, and, upon judgment being obtained, purchased the shares at sale under an execution issued upon said judgment, all of which acts were had and taken without notice to plaintiff that any one other than Mrs. Leenhouts had any claim, right, or title to the stock. As ultimate facts the court found:

"That at the time of the execution and delivery of said mortgage to the said William Garland, all right of Mrs. John Leenhouts to receive water from the said Dunsmore Canyon Water Company was a right appurtenant to the aforesaid lot 1 in block K of the Crescenta-Canada tract, and formed a part of the property mortgaged at said time to the said defendant William Garland; and that the said William Garland * * * is now, and has been at all times since, the owner and holder of said lot * * * together with all water rights, pipe lines and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining"; and that "said William Garland is the owner and holder of, and entitled to the possession of, the aforesaid ten shares of the capital stock of the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company, standing in the name of the defendant Mrs. John Leenhouts, and all of the right, title, and interest of the said Mrs. John Leenhouts therein and thereto, and is entitled to have the said stock transferred upon the books of said corporation into his own name." And, further, "that the said William Garland is the only person who has any right, title or interest in or to said ten shares of stock, and that the plaintiff has no right, title or interest in or to said ten shares of stock, or any part thereof."

[1] Upon these facts appellant invokes the well-recognized rule that where one at a sale under execution, and in the absence of facts shown which charge him with notice that another has an interest therein as owner or pledgee, buys shares of corporate stock standing upon the books of a corporation in the name of the judgment debtor, he acquires absolute title thereto. Farmers' etc., Bank v. Wilson, 58 Cal. 600; Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 Pac. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348; West Coast Safety Faucet Co. v. Wulff, 133 Cal. 315, 65 Pac. 622, 85 Am. St. Rep. 171. Conceding the general application of this rule to purchases of stock so made in a corporation conducted for profit and distributed to its shareholders as dividends, it is, both upon principle and authority, inapplicable to the facts found to exist in the instant case.

[2] That prior to the formation of the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company Mrs. Leenhouts, by virtue of a deed of conveyance, was, as owner of the ten-acre tract of land, entitled to $\frac{1}{110}$ of the flow of water in said Dunsmore Canyon as an appurtenance thereto, admits of no controversy, and appellant concedes that neither the deed nor the appurtenance would be the subject of a separate levy and sale, since the right to the water for use upon the land must, upon such facts, be deemed part of the real estate. This being true, how could the ownership be terminated or the appurtenance severed by the mere substitution of the stock for the deed as evidence of ownership? The right to the flow of water was in no wise changed and the use thereof was identically the same after the issuance of the stock as it was prior thereto. The corporation was not created for profit and to pay dividends to the stockholders, but solely and alone for the convenient and more economical management of a common source of water in the distribution of and from which, according to their respective rights, the owners of these several tracts of land were entitled to a supply of water for use thereon. While it is true that one owning a water right appurtenant to his land may, as held in Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 146, 27 Pac. 543, convey it separate from the land and thus sever the connection, nevertheless the mere exchange of one muniment of title to the water right for another cannot be deemed a severance thereof from the land to which it was concededly appurtenant. As said in Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 81 Pac. 539, where the facts were substantially the same as those here involved:

"There was a formal conveyance of the legal title of the several water rights to the corporation, but simultaneously the grantors received certificates of stock which constituted them the beneficiaries of everything so conveyed in the proportion of their original interests. As stockholders they became entitled to receive their proportionate share of all that the company was authorized to divide. It had nothing but water to divide, and of that they received the same share and in the same manner and order in which they had received it before the conveyance. And the successive owners of the six-acre tract applied it after the conveyance to that tract as they had done before. All that happened was that a right which they had held and exercised under one title before the conveyance was held and exercised under a (formally) different title afterwards. There was in fact no moment of time when they lost the right to use the water, and there was no cessation of its use on the particular tract. Neither the corporation nor any other persons acquired any right to divert it to another use. And the question whether a water right is appurtenant to a particular tract does not depend in the least degree upon the source of title to the water right; it is made appurtenant to the land by use on the land for its benefit, and here the undisputed right of the Fullers and the decedent to receive eight hours' run of all the company's water out of every three hundred and sixty hours was made and continued appurtenant to the six-acre tract by use on the land in the irrigation of trees that greatly increased its value, and would perish without it. In view of these facts it is clear that the water right remained appurtenant to the land, that it would have passed by conveyance of the land, and, if so, that it passed by the devise to respondent (Civ. Code, § 1311), and did not fall into the residue distributable to the appellant."

The water right in question evidenced by the stock was an appurtenance of the land. The deed followed the foreclosure of a mortgage duly recorded long before plaintiff attached the stock and wherein the owner of the land mortgaged the same, "together with all water rights, pipe lines, ditches and appurtenances thereunto belonging." Hence it follows that Garland acquired title to the water right, and his ownership thereof is in no wise affected by any omission as to delivery or transfer of the stock prior to plaintiff's levy and sale thereof made subsequent to the execution and recording of the mortgage.

[3] Moreover, section 324, Civil Code, provides that a corporation organized for supplying water for irrigation purposes and domestic use may in its by-laws provide that such water shall only be sold and distributed to the owners of its capital stock, and that such stock shall be appurtenant to the lands, when described in the certificate issued therefor, provided such by-law be recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which the lands are situated, and in such case the shares of stock so located on such land shall only be transferred therewith and pass as an appurtenance thereto. Now, while it appears the Dunsmore Canyon Water Company was a corporation of the description stated in said section, the record is silent as to whether it had complied with the provision in regard to adopting and causing to be recorded a by-law that the stock should be deemed appurtenant to the lands described in the certificate therefor. Nevertheless, conceding the ultimate finding, to the effect that Garland was the exclusive owner of the stock, depended solely upon a showing of compliance on the part of the corporation with the provision referred to, we must, in the absence of evidence to the contrary or anything appearing in the probative findings which negatives such fact (and there is nothing), assume, if necessary in support of the judgment, that proof of compliance was in fact made and the court based its conclusion thereon. In United States Film Co. v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 186 Pac. 364, this court said:

"Where an appellant complains of errors committed by the trial court, it devolves upon him to produce a duly authenticated record affirmatively showing the alleged error; otherwise the court on appeal must, if under any circumstances the ruling could be deemed correct, assume that such condition or circumstance was made to appear."

To the same effect are Escondido High School District v. Escondido Seminary, 130 Cal. 128, 62 Pac. 401, and Paine v. San Bernardino Valley Traction Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 Pac. 659.

Hence, for this reason alone, it cannot be said upon the record that the court erred in making the finding of ultimate fact upon which the judgment rests. If such compliance was not shown, then, in order to avail itself of the point, appellant should have brought up a record disclosing the want thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

BRUSH v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Civ. 3310.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 9, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1920.)

1. Evidence — 243(4)—Declaration of agent as to past event not part of res gestæ inadmissible against principal.

Declaration of agent that a bridge was faulty from the manner in which it had been constructed, not being made in regard to a transaction in the course of his agency depending at the time, so as to make the declaration a part of the res gestæ, is inadmissible against his principal.

2. Limitation of actions — 55(7) — Only on storm waters being backed by faulty construction of bridge does statute run.

Building of bridge by defendants not being a nuisance in itself or an invasion of plaintiff's rights, but becoming so only when, because of faulty construction, it diverted storm waters and debris from the channel onto plaintiff's land, the statute commenced to run only on the receipt of such consequential injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Albert L. Brush against the Southern Pacific Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Bradner W. Lee, Kenyon F. Lee, and Bradner W. Lee, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action, alleging that the defendants so negligently constructed, and maintained, a bridge over a waterway, or "wash," extending from the San Dimas Canyon in the Sierra Madre Mountains, that during an unusually heavy rainfall, in the months of January and February, 1914, large quantities of trees, rocks, orchard cuttings, railroad ties, planks, and other debris were carried by the water, and accumulated against and between the piling of said bridge, clogging up the waterway, causing the water to dam up for a distance of 800 feet back of the bridge, destroying 75 orange trees, and injuring 500 others; also causing gravel to be deposited over about six acres of plaintiff's land, to a depth of one to three feet. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff for the sum of $7,200, after a verdict for that amount by a jury, and the defendants appeal.

In defense of the action the defendants set up that the lands described in plaintiff's complaint were as a matter of fact, part of the natural course and bed of the San Dimas wash, which the plaintiff set about to reclaim; that, by reason of the construction of a retaining wall by the plaintiff, along the natural line of the bank of the wash, in said work of reclamation, the water was prevented from following its natural course; and, further, that the bridge was of substantial construction, erected in 1884, permanent in its nature; and that any cause of action against the defendants by reason of the faulty erection of the bridge was barred by the statute of limitations. Defendants also alleged an unprecedented amount of rainfall as the cause of the excessive flow in the waterway.

[1] The judgment must be reversed. After the overflow W. H. Whalen, division superintendent of the Los Angeles division of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, made an examination of the bridge. Over the objection of the defendants, witness Carlson was permitted to testify that upon the occasion of this inspection Whalen stated that the bridge was not properly constructed because of the piling being driven diagonally across the stream. The purpose of the introduction of this testimony was to show that the bridge was an obstruction to the stream. The admission of this testimony was error. The conversation not being part of the res gestæ was inadmissible as a declaration by the employé against his employer. Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 188, 191, 60 Pac. 687. The bridge was constructed many years before the division superintendent became in any way connected with defendant, and the declaration, if made by him concerning it, was inadmissible as not made in regard to a transaction in the course of his agency, depending at the very time of the declaration. Beasley v. San Jose Fruit-Packing Co., 92 Cal. 388, 28 Pac. 485; Umstead v. Automobile Funding Co. of America, 185 Pac. 1011.

Respondent seeks to justify the admission of this testimony upon the theory that it was alleged in the complaint, and denied in the answer, that the defendants knew, or could have known by the exercise of ordinary diligence, that it was necessary for them to keep said bridge open, and free and clear of all debris, in order that the natural flow, and free passage, of rain and storm water, and such debris, would not be prevented. It is also urged that Whalen's declaration should not have prejudiced defendants, because they themselves developed that the wooden pile bridge had been removed and a steel span bridge suspended, after the damage. Whalen was, himself, called to the stand and denied Carlson's testimony. Respondent argues, therefore, that it was for the jury to decide which of the two men to believe. None of these contentions remove the testimony from the application of the rule adhered to in the foregoing authorities.

[2] Appellants contend that the cause of action of the plaintiff is barred by the statute of limitations, not having been begun within either two or three years following the erection of the bridge which was proved to be a permanent structure. They take the position that the limitation period for injury to land, under such circumstances, begins to run from the completion of the structure, although the injury may occur during periods of high water, during successive years thereafter. Appellants have misconstrued the nature of the present action. It is not one to recover for an injury, direct and resulting immediately, from the construction of the bridge, but relates to damages which were an after-result from the erection of that structure. In other words, the action for damages for the injury to the plaintiff's land, caused by the obstruction of the storm waters in San Dimas Canyon, as the result of the construction of the bridge by the defendants, is not for a trespass upon real property, but it is in the nature of an action upon the case at common law for a consequential injury. Daneri v. Southern California Railway Co., 122 Cal. 507, 55 Pac. 243; Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 309, 49 Pac. 189.

The true rule as to the application of the statute of limitations in such cases is stated by Mr. Redfield, in his work on Railways (6th Ed., vol. 1, p. 595), as follows:

"The general rule in regard to the time of the accruing of the action is that when the act or omission causes direct and immediate injury, the action accrues from the time of doing the act; but where the act is injurious only from its consequences, as the undermining a house or wall, or causing water to flow back at certain seasons of high tide or high water, the cause of action accrues only from the consequential injury."

The case at bar falls within the decision of St. Louis, etc., Co. v. Biggs, 52 Ark. 240, 244, 12 S. W. 331 (6 L. R. A. 804, 20 Am. St. Rep. 174), where the Supreme Court of Arkansas said:

"Whenever the nuisance is of a permanent character and its construction and continuance are necessarily an injury, the damage is original, and may be, at once, fully compensated. In such case the statute of limitations begins to run upon the construction of the nuisance. Railway Co. v. Morris, 35 Ark. 622; Railway Co. v. Chapman, 39 Ark. 463. But when such structure is permanent in its character, and its construction and continuance are not necessarily injurious, but may or may not be so, the injury to be compensated in a suit is only the damage which has happened; and there may be as many successive recoveries as there are successive injuries. In such case the statute of limitations begins to run from the happening of the injury complained of. [Citing cases.]"

The building of the bridge by the defendants was not of itself a nuisance or an invasion of plaintiff's rights, but became so only when, by reason of its alleged faulty construction, it diverted the storm waters and debris from the usual channel, upon plaintiff's land. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kyle, 101 S. W. 272; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Hoshall, 82 Ark. 387, 102 S. W. 207; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Ford, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 117 S. W. 203; Hill v. Empire, etc., Co. (C. C.) 158 Fed. 881. Suit in the instant case having been commenced within two years after the receipt of these consequential injuries by plaintiff, his causes of action were not barred by the statute of limitations. Daneri v. Southern California Railway Co., 122 Cal. 507, 55 Pac. 243; Hicks v. Drew, 117 Cal. 305, 309, 49 Pac. 189.

The authorities relied upon by appellants to the contrary deal with cases where injuries caused by permanent structures infringed immediately upon plaintiff's rights. Such instances are, where water is permanently polluted, streams immediately caused to flow back on adjacent land, and currents of a river turned aside by permanent dikes, at once begin to cut into the opposite bank. They do not deal with cases similar to the one at bar, where a permanent and lawful structure has, for many years, existed without any consequential injury resulting from its construction.

The appellants complain of the giving of certain instructions and of the refusal of the trial court to give others. Taking the charge as a whole, we think the jury was properly instructed.

The judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 13, 1920.
Rehearing Denied May 12, 1920.)

1. Account stated ⇨4—Execution of note was stating of account.

Execution of a note was the stating of an account between the parties.

2. Evidence ⇨469—Payments on note prior to execution inadmissible as varying writing.

In an action to recover a balance due on a note and to foreclose a chattel mortgage securing it, evidence of payments prior to execution of the note applying towards its satisfaction was inadmissible as varying the terms of the instrument by parol.

3. Payment ⇨21, 67(1) — Receipt of check, though not payment, presumptively so where check not returned.

The mere receipt of a check by the creditor from the debtor does not operate as payment, but where the creditor fails to return it, or to make any protest of nonpayment, and in no way questions the transaction, he will be presumed to have collected the money.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡29(1)—Overpayment held proper matter for counterclaim.

In action to recover balance due on promissory note and to foreclose chattel mortgage securing it, facts alleged by defendant in his cross-complaint as to overpayments, all growing out of a transaction of which the note sued on was a part, held to constitute proper matter of counterclaim, under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2.

5. Pleading ⚡148—Cross-complaint for overpayments insufficient without averment of demand or failure to repay.

In action for balance due on a note and to foreclose chattel mortgage securing it, cross-complaint by defendant for certain overpayments made by him held insufficient, in the absence of allegation of either demand for or failure to repay.

6. Appeal and error ⚡1170(3)—Overruling of demurrer to cross-complaint harmless.

In an action to recover a balance on a note and to foreclose chattel mortgage securing it, overruling of plaintiff's demurrer to defendant's cross-complaint for certain overpayments on the note, insufficient in the absence of an averment, held harmless to plaintiff, and to be disregarded by the appellate court under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

7. Pleading ⚡403(2)—Omission from complaint may be aided by answer despite erroneous overruling of demurrer.

An express denial by answer of matter omitted from the complaint cures the omission—a rule which applies even though a demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint has been erroneously overruled.

8. Interest ⚡47(1)—Maker of note cross-complaining for overpayments not entitled to interest before filing cross-complaint.

In absence of showing that payee of note willfully or wrongfully received overpayments from the maker, in absence of demand upon him for repayment by maker prior to filing of maker's cross-complaint in payee's action on the note for a balance due, the maker was not entitled to interest on any amount of his recovery under his cross-action prior to the date of filing his cross-complaint.

Action by James B. Bledsoe against L. C. Stuckey. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Bledsoe & Phipps, of San Bernardino (Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, of counsel), for appellant.

A. C. Galloway, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought to recover an alleged balance of $313.30 on a promissory note for $2,675, and to foreclose a chattel mortgage securing the same. Defendant by his answer pleaded payment of the note in full, and by cross-complaint seeks to recover from plaintiff the sum of $546, which defendant claims to have paid by mistake in excess of his indebtedness on the transaction. The judgment was that plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant recover the amount of overpayment alleged in his cross-complaint. The main contention on the appeal is as to the application of two payments, aggregating $700, made by defendant to the plaintiff prior to the execution of the note sued on.

The transaction out of which the entire controversy grows was substantially as follows: In May, 1911, an agreement was entered into between the parties whereby the plaintiff sold to the defendant a lot of cattle and all of plaintiff's interest under a certificate of purchase from the state of California in 280 acres of land in Kern county. The price to be paid for the land was $400, as a fixed sum, with a further payment of $600 if plaintiff's interest in a portion of the tract should be confirmed by the courts in pending litigation with certain adverse claimants. The number of head of live stock purchased was not specified in the original agreement, further than that defendant was to take all of plaintiff's cattle at $22.50 per head, excepting some 15 or 20 head, which plaintiff reserved. There is conflict in the evidence as to how many head of cattle were actually sold and delivered to defendant. The evidence taken on the trial shows that at the date of the original agreement defendant paid to appellant on account of the transaction $200, and in December of the same year the further sum of $500. Subsequently, on January 15, 1912, by way of an adjustment of his indebtedness, defendant executed the promissory note sued on for the principal sum of $2,675, and a chattel mortgage securing the same on 120 head of the cattle purchased from plaintiff and 100 additional cattle of his own. The defendant testified that he only received 120 head of cattle from the plaintiff, and that this note and mortgage for $2,675 covered the price he was to pay for them. It is conceded that the land litigation was determined later in plaintiff's favor, and that defendant, subsequent to the execution of the note, became liable for the additional $600 agreed to be paid for the land, making a total liability on the entire transaction, according to defendant's contention, and as the court found, of $3,675. Defendant claims credit on this amount for the two payments aggregating $700 made prior to the note and mortgage, which, if allowed, with the subsequent payments shown in evidence, would leave the balance in defendant's favor as claimed under his cross-complaint. Plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that there were at least 140 head of cattle sold to defendant, besides one or two horses; that the entire indebtedness was several hundred dollars in excess of $3,675; and that the $700 paid prior to the execution of the note and mortgage left a balance of $2,675 for which the note was given, besides the contingent balance of $600 on the land.

[1, 2] If the only question involved was the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court, we would be compelled under this conflict in the testimony to uphold the findings under the contention of defendant that his total indebtedness amounted to only $3,675, and that he was entitled to credit thereon for the $200 and $500 payments made prior to the execution of the note. But it is contended on behalf of appellant that the admission of evidence of these prior payments as applying toward the satisfaction of the note was error. This testimony was objected to by appellant on the ground that it was an attempt to dispute the terms of a written contract; that by the terms of the note, executed long after these payments were made, it was stipulated and agreed that at the date of the execution of the note defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,675; and that an attempt to reduce the amount by credits arising from previous transactions between the parties was varying the terms of a written instrument by parol evidence. We do not see how this conclusion is to be avoided. The execution of this note was the written declaration, in the most decisive manner, of a present indebtedness of $2,675. It was, moreover, a stating of account between the parties. Kinley v. Thelen, 158 Cal. 175, 183, 110 Pac. 513. There is no attempt to avoid it by any allegation or showing of fraud or mistake; and we do not see on what theory defendant could be permitted to say that the amount of his liability was not what the note called for, but $700 less than that sum. It cannot be shown by parol that the sum to become payable under the terms of the note is different from that specified, nor that a certain prior account was to be deducted from the note. Daniel on Neg. Insts. § 81. Parol evidence cannot prove a contemporaneous condition which might reduce a specified sum payable on the note. 2 Parsons on Bills and Notes, p. 506. In Eaves v. Henderson, reported in 17 Wend. (N. Y.) 190 the defendant sought to set off on a suit upon his promissory note certain amounts due him on account with the plaintiff prior to the execution of the note. The court held this to be an attempt to contradict the amount expressed in the note, and that the evidence was inadmissible, even though in that case it was claimed that at the time the note was executed it was agreed by the payee that the items of the account should apply on the note.

If it be argued that if these disputed payments of $200 and $500 should be held to be not applicable in reducing the amount due under the note sued on they at least represent a liability for money had and received by the plaintiff without consideration, and hence recoverable by cross-complaint in this action, the answer to this is the plea of the statute of limitations set out in plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint; these payments having been made upwards of four years prior to the filing of the cross-complaint. Of course, the payments made after the execution of the note, and properly applicable as payments thereon, to which plaintiff also pleads the statute of limitations, are not subject to the bar of the statute, for the reason that they applied as payments as of the date of their receipt by plaintiff. We think, too, in further bar of the claim that these two payments are applicable in reduction of the amount of the note and mortgage, that paragraph 2 of defendant's cross-complaint is in effect an admission of a balance of indebtedness owing to plaintiff at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage of $2,675. This indebtedness being evidenced at a date long after the payments were made, they clearly cannot be allowed in reduction of the amount so admitted to be owing by the cross-complaint and by the note itself.

Our conclusion on this point is, therefore, that on January 15, 1912, defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff was fixed, beyond evasion by parol evidence, at the sum of $2,675, as shown by the note of that date. It also appears by undisputed evidence that subsequently, by a favorable termination of the litigation on the land, the further contingent sum of $600 became due from defendant to plaintiff. This last amount, as the admitted facts show, was increased by certain accruals of interest and installments on the land to the sum of $692. This sum was paid on April 19, 1915, however, thus disposing of that item. It only remains to be seen what payments are properly to be credited on the promissory note, and to any overpayment which defendant may be entitled to recover.

[3] From June 12, 1911, to October 27, 1914, payments were made in an aggregate amount of $3,000, which, it clearly appears, are rightly credited to defendant. In addition to proof of these payments, defendant introduced a letter from plaintiff of date August 24, 1914, in which the latter acknowledges the receipt, on or about that date, of another check from defendant for $300. None of the witnesses seemed to have a very distinct knowledge as to this check, and the check itself, canceled or otherwise, was not produced. Defendant had no definite recollection regarding it, and stated that he did not know whether it was his own check or one drawn in his favor by some one else and indorsed over to plaintiff. Plaintiff does not deny having received it, or that he collected on it. Appellant is supported by the authorities cited in the contention that the mere receipt of a check by the creditor does not operate as payment. But in a case where, as here, the creditor acknowledges the receipt of the check, does not deny that he cashed it, fails to return it or make any protest of nonpayment to the debtor, and in no way questions the transaction, he will be presumed to have collected the money. The court was justified in crediting the defendant with the amount. These payments applicable on the defendant's account aggregate a total amount of $3,300. The total sum due under the terms of the note, including interest calculated on the basis of the various partial payments, is $3,104.49. This leaves an overpayment of $195.51 subject to recovery under defendant's cross-complaint, if properly pleaded, instead of $546, as allowed by the judgment.

[4] Appellant, however, contends that his demurrer to the cross-complaint should have been sustained, both on the ground that the facts pleaded were not proper matter of cross-complaint, and on the ground that the facts alleged were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. We think the facts alleged constitute a proper cross-complaint. They all grew out of a transaction of which the note sued on in the main action was a part. This is at least true as to all moneys paid by defendant to plaintiff on which credits are herein allowed to respondent. Treating the land purchase as entirely a separate transaction from the liability arising on the note, as contended for by appellant, it appears to have been adjusted separately between the parties. The $692 payment made April 19, 1915, is conceded to have been in settlement of the balance due on the land trade. All the other payments made subsequent to the execution of the note were properly credited thereon, and any overpayment made by respondent is included in the $1,000 payment of October 27, 1914, which was admittedly made on the note; and the claim to recover the amount of overpayment arises on an overpayment on the note—the contract sued on in plaintiff's action. In any event, defendant's action upon his affirmative pleading is in effect for money had and received by plaintiff, and arises on an implied contract to repay. The facts alleged constituted proper matter of counterclaim under subdivision 2 of section 438, Code of Civil Procedure, if not of cross-complaint. We see no reason, nor any prejudice resulting to appellant, to prevent treating it as a counterclaim. "It is not what a pleading is called, but the facts which it sets up, that determines its character. Its character and sufficiency will be determined by the court from the facts alleged in it." McDougald v. Hulet, 132 Cal. 155, 160, 64 Pac. 278, 280; Holmes v. Richet, 56 Cal. 307, 38 Am. Rep. 54; Gregory v. Bovier, 77 Cal. 121, 19 Pac. 232; Meeker v. Dalton, 75 Cal. 154, 16 Pac. 764.

[5] The demurrer, for want of facts in the cross-complaint, however, we think should have been sustained. There is no averment of either demand for or nonpayment of the overpayments claimed by the defendant. There is nothing in the cross-complaint to indicate that the excess payments on the plaintiff's demand were made or received other than through mutual mistake of the parties. As is said under a similar state of facts in Dunham v. McDonald, 34 Cal. App. 744, 168 Pac. 1063:

"He does not allege that the cross-defendant had any better knowledge of the circumstances and facts than he had. Under such circumstances we think that a demand for payment was a prerequisite to the filing of the cross-complaint. * * * It seems too clear for argument that it was necessary also to show by appropriate allegation in the cross-complaint that the money claimed by the defendant of the plaintiff had not been paid."

[6] While, however, the overruling of plaintiff's demurrer was error, we think it was error without prejudice, and may be disregarded under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[7] In the first place, the failure to allege nonpayment, and perhaps, also, the failure to allege demand before bringing suit, was cured by defendant's denial, in answer to the cross-complaint, that there had been any amount paid in excess of the balance due on the note and mortgage, or that there was any amount whatever due or owing the defendant. While the more common application of the rule of curing defects in a complaint by averments in the answer contemplates an affirmative allegation in the answer of the precise fact omitted from the complaint (Pomeroy on Remedies, § 579), it seems to have been the practice in this state to treat an express denial by answer of the omitted matter as curing the omission. Vance v. Anderson, 113 Cal. 537, 45 Pac. 816; Abner Doble Co. v. McDonald, 145 Cal. 641, 79 Pac. 369; Flinn v. Ferry, 127 Cal. 648, 60 Pac. 434. This rule that omitted allegations of a complaint may be aided by averments in the answer applies even though a demurrer to the sufficiency of the complaint has been erroneously overruled. Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 169, 42 Pac. 568; Savings Bank v. Barrett, 126 Cal. 413, 58 Pac. 914; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 413, 50 Pac. 546; Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 27 Pac. 215, 13 L. R. A. 711; Donegan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 632, 90 Pac. 1073. Moreover, the cross-defendant was clearly not taken at a disadvantage or in any way prejudiced by failure to allege nonpayment of money he denies ever having received or owed; and it is a fair presumption that it would have been a futile act on the part of defendant to have demanded payment of this claim before filing his cross-complaint. This is not a case where a demand was a necessary prerequisite to the accrual of the cross-defendant's liability. The only object of the demand in such a case as this is to give the adverse party an opportunity to make settlement, if he desires, without being subjected to a suit; and where, as here, the action between the parties is already pending, and the cross-demand arises from the same transaction, it is questionable if a demand is necessary (Sharkey v. Mansfield, 90 N. Y. 227, 43 Am. Rep. 161), and in any event, the failure to plead it is of trifling consequence.

[8] We are of the opinion, however, that in the absence of a showing that the plaintiff willfully or wrongfully received these overpayments from defendant, and no demand having been made prior to filing the cross-complaint, defendant was not entitled to interest on any amount of his recovery under the cross-action prior to the date of filing his cross-complaint, and as already indicated, there was error in crediting certain payments on the note.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to retry the issues as to amount of recovery on the cross-complaint.

STERN, State Supt. of Banks, v. McDONALD
et al. (Civ. 3197.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. April 12, 1920. Rehearing Denied May 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes §92(1)—Transaction held sale of bonds which amounted to consideration for note.

Where bonds held by a bank depreciated and the bank examiner demanded as a condition to its continuing in business that directors and stockholders pay the bank a large sum of money and take up the bonds, the transaction whereby such persons gave their note, pledging the bonds as collateral, was a sale, and the note will be deemed supported by the consideration.

2. Bills and notes §92(1)—Note executed by directors to make good impairment of bank's assets supported by consideration.

A note executed by bank directors to make good impairment of bank's assets so as to enable the institution to continue in business is supported by a consideration, and recovery cannot be denied on the ground of want of consideration.

3. Bills and notes §477—Answer setting up misrepresentation insufficient, without stating reliance on fraud.

In an action on a note executed by defendants, bank directors, etc., to make good an impairment of the bank's assets, answer setting up that the superintendent of banks in procuring the note made fraudulent misrepresentations is insufficient, where it was not alleged that defendants relied on such representations.

4. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

The trial court's finding of facts on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Estoppel §68(2)—Intervention of superintendent of banks to protect bonds deposited as collateral did not estop him from asserting that bank directors had purchased bonds.

Where the superintendent of banks as a condition to a bank continuing in business required defendants, directors, etc., to buy bonds which had depreciated, and they executed their note for a large amount, depositing the bonds as collateral, the fact that the superintendent later intervened in litigation affecting the bonds, setting up that the bank was a holder thereof, was not a rescission or repudiation of the transaction which would estop him from asserting defendants had purchased the bonds, for though the bank was a mere pledgee, it had a special property in the bonds which the superintendent should protect.

6. Bills and notes §30—Note to cover impairment of assets binding though not joint and several as directed.

Where the superintendent of banks required the directors, etc., to make good an impairment of assets, and, while they executed a note, they did not execute a joint and several one, as directed, that fact did not render invalid the note actually executed, which they listed as an asset and on which they paid interest; the detriment, if any, being to the bank's creditors.

7. Bills and notes §452(1)—Directors' note to take up depreciated bonds binding, though sale not authorized by resolution.

Where a bank's assets suffered impairment on the depreciation of bonds, and the bank examiner required the directors, etc., to purchase a number of bonds, whereupon they gave their note, which was secured by a pledge of the bonds, they cannot, after insolvency of the bank, defeat recovery on the note on the ground that they did not, by resolution, authorize the sale.

8. Pledges §55—Possession of pledge does not preclude judgment in first instance against debtor.

That bonds were deposited as collateral security of a note will not render judgment for recovery on the note against the makers, without reference to the collateral, invalid, for the possession of pledged property does not suspend the right of the pledgee to proceed personally against the payor for his debt without selling the pledge, for it is only collateral.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Pearis, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Stern, substituted for W. R. Williams as Superintendent of Banks of the State of California, against Ronald McDonald and others, and Sarah L. Conner, executrix of the last will and testament of C. L. Conner, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendants first named appeal. Affirmed.

E. L. Foster and Chas. A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. The superintendent of banks of California, on behalf of the Kern Valley Bank, an insolvent corporation, obtained a judgment against the above-named defendants, severally, in amounts aggregating $85,000, from which all of said defendants appeal except the defendant Sarah L. Conner, the executrix of the last will of C. L. Conner, deceased. The action is based upon a promissory note, dated October 15, 1909, drawn in favor of said Kern Valley Bank for the aggregate sum of $105,000, payable in the amounts and in the manner following: Ronald McDonald, $40,000; C. L. Conner, $20,000; P. L. Jewett, $10,000; S. Wright Jewett, $10,000; L. P. St. Clair, $20,000; George W. Price, $5,000. All of the payors named therein signed the note except L. P. St. Clair. The plaintiff alleges that the payment of said note was secured by a pledge of 95 bonds, of the par value of $1,000 each of the Sunset Road Oil Company, a corporation, and prays judgment against the payors, severally, for the amounts for which they respectively obligated themselves on the note, and that "said bonds be sold according to the usual course and practice of this court, and that the proceeds thereof be applied to the payment of said promissory note."

C. L. Conner died prior to the commencement of suit, and his executrix was made a party defendant. She filed no answer. The other defendants joined in an answer, in which they urged the defenses of no consideration, fraud and estoppel. The court found against the defendants on those issues, and further found that said note was given in payment of the purchase price of the bonds which had been pledged as security for the payment of the note, and which the court found had been previously sold to the defendants by the bank. The judgment made no disposition of the pledged bonds. At the time of the execution of the note all of the payors were directors and principal stockholders of said Kern Valley Bank, and Conner and McDonald were, respectively, its president and cashier, and S. Wright Jewett and George W. Price were its assistant cashiers. On May 12, 1911, the bank became insolvent, and W. R. Williams, as superintendent of banks, took possession. The note in question and the pledged bonds were among the bank's assets.

The record discloses abundant evidence to support the findings and judgment. It shows that immediately prior to October 15, 1909, said Sunset Road Oil Company bonds, of which the bank owned a large number, had depreciated in value to the extent that the bank's capital had become impaired; that Alden Anderson, then superintendent of banks, demanded that defendants, who, as above stated, were the directors and principal stockholders of the bank, pay $105,000 into the bank, in cash or its equivalent, and directed that this should be done by means of a sale from the bank to the defendants of 95 bonds of said Sunset Road Oil Company, at par and accrued interest, and stated that the joint and several promissory note of defendants, properly secured by the bonds so purchased, would be accepted in payment of said bonds. Anderson informed defendants that unless this arrangement was carried out he could not allow the bank to continue business. The transaction was consummated in accordance with Anderson's directions, except that a several note was executed and delivered to the bank instead of a joint and several note, and that St. Clair did not sign the note, thereby reducing the aggregate amount of the note from $105,000 to $85,000. Subsequently one J. W. Harper, a bank examiner, acting under the direction of Anderson, visited the bank, and verified the fact that the note had been executed and the bonds pledged. Harper at that time was informed that St. Clair had not signed the note because he was out of town, but that he would do so upon his return. Across the bottom of the note was indorsed, in the handwriting of the defendant McDonald:

"Secured by 95 bonds of $1,000, being bonds No. 645 to 740, inclusive, of the Sunset Road Oil Co."

These bonds were afterwards listed by the defendants, as officers of the bank, in the bank's reports as pledged bonds, and the interest on the note was paid monthly by defendants up to and until one month before the bank closed, in May, 1911.

[1, 2] The evidence above narrated clearly shows a legal sale of said bonds from the bank to the defendants, and that said sale constituted a valid consideration for the note. The conceded purpose for which the sale was made and the note given was that the bank might be allowed to continue business. There was an impairment of the bank's assets, for which the bank could have been closed, and in order to relieve that embarrassment and to insure the bank's continuance in business the directors, at the direction of the superintendent of banks, purchased said bonds and executed said

note. This was done to bring up the amount of the bank's depreciated capital to the standard fixed by the superintendent of banks. That of itself constituted a valuable consideration for the note. It has been held by numerous authorities that a note or bond, executed by the directors of a bank to make good an impairment of the bank's assets, so that the bank may continue in business, is based upon a valid consideration. Skordal v. Stanton, 89 Minn. 511, 95 N. W. 449; First Nat. Bk. v. Felt, 100 Iowa, 680, 69 N. W. 1057; Hurd v. Kelly, 78 N. Y. 588, 34 Am. Rep. 567; Murphy v. Gumaer, 18 Colo. App. 183, 70 Pac. 800; Nat. Bk. of Salt Lake City v. Nelson, 38 Utah, 169, 111 Pac. 907.

[3,4] The defense of fraud urged by defendants is based upon certain representations claimed to have been made by Anderson to the defendants at the time of the execution of the note, to the effect that one W. S. Tevis would also purchase a like number of bonds, and in payment thereof would execute a similar note, but that he had failed to do so, and that defendants were unaware that he had not done so until after the bank had been closed in May, 1911. This defense is insufficiently pleaded, for the reason that there are no allegations made by defendants that they relied upon said representations, or that they believed them to be true. However that may be, a consideration of this defense seems quite unnecessary, for the reason that both Anderson and Harper denied that any such representations were made, and the court found that their testimony was true. Any evidence to the contrary would raise a mere conflict, and would not justify an interference with the findings of the trial court.

[5] The defense of estoppel is based upon an alleged rescission or repudiation of the sale of the bonds by Superintendent Williams. In this respect it is alleged and was proved that in an action independent from this one, commenced by the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco against the Sunset Road Oil Company, a corporation, involving the bonds of said Sunset Road Oil Company, Williams, as superintendent of banks, intervened, and filed a cross-complaint, alleging "that said Kern Valley Bank was the owner of the specific bonds here involved." The fact that he did so, however, utterly fails to prove rescission or repudiation. As holder of the pledged bonds it was his duty to protect them and to controvert any claim made by third persons claiming ownership or seeking to obtain possession of said bonds, and it was not necessary in such a proceeding that Williams should allege and prove that he held said bonds merely as a pledge. As pledgee he was vested with a special property in said bonds sufficient to maintain an action against third persons for the recovery of said bonds. 31 Cyc. 824; Treadwell v. Davis, 34 Cal. 601, 94 Am. Dec. 770; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99; Merced Bk. v. Price, 9 Cal. App. 177, 98 Pac. 383. Therefore the allegations of Williams in that action that the bank was the owner of said bonds was in accordance with the law and the facts.

[6] Appellants' contention that said note was invalid because it was not a joint and several note, as Anderson had directed it should be, is also without merit. Appellants knew of the purpose for which the note was given, and as officials of the bank they were presumably familiar with the form of the note signed by them. They afterwards recognized the validity of the note by listing it among the bank's assets and by paying interest on it monthly for a year and a half. Furthermore, it is not apparent wherein appellants have been prejudiced by the execution of a several note. If it had been a joint and several note the individual defendants under the law could have been called upon to pay the full amount of the note. If anybody has suffered by the oversight it is the bank's creditors and not the appellants.

[7] Appellants also claim that the sale of the bonds was not valid because it was not authorized by a resolution of the board of directors, but that it was made merely upon an order issued by the superintendent of banks, in whom, it is claimed, the power to authorize such sale was not vested. The answer to that is that it does not appear from the record whether or not such a resolution was in fact passed, but, assuming that it was not passed, it does not lie with the defendants to take advantage of the point, for the reason that as payors of the note the law will not allow them to relieve themselves of their obligation to the bank because they, as directors of the bank, in dealing with the bank, may have willfully or otherwise exceeded their lawful authority.

[8] Appellants' final point is that the judgment is erroneous because it merely provides for the recovery of the note without reference to the security. It is contended that the judgment should direct that the security be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the note. The authorities, however, do not support appellants' contention. It has been repeatedly held that in the absence of statute or stipulation to the contrary, the possession of pledged property does not suspend the right of the pledgee to proceed personally against the payor for his debt without selling the pledge, for the reason that the security is only collateral. Jones v. Evans, 6 Cal. App. 88, 91 Pac. 532, wherein the authorities are reviewed.

Judgment affirmed.

OAKDALE IRR. DIST. v. BEARD et al.
(Civ. 2099.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 10, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses ⚡228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Evidence held to sustain finding of damages in amount of bond to irrigation district from improper work.

In an action by an irrigation district against its contractor and the surety on his bond, evidence of improper performance of the work and as to damages held to sustain judgment for plaintiff district for $10,000, coincidentally the exact amount of the bond.

2. Waters and water courses ⚡228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Defects in irrigation district contract not defense to contractor and surety sued on bond.

Though there were certain defects in the steps leading up to an original contract by an irrigation district for certain work, and though the law was not complied with in all respects, such defects are no defense to a suit on the bond securing the work by the district against the contractor and his surety.

3. Estoppel ⚡22(3) — Waters and water courses ⚡228½, New, vol. 10A Key-No. Series—Recitals of second bond evidence that contractor had not performed.

If the contractor with an irrigation district had fully performed his original contract, he was entitled to be paid the agreed amount without giving a new bond that he would complete it, and the recitals of a second bond signed by him and his surety that certain parts of the work were unsatisfactory to the directors and engineer of the district are conclusive, or at least very strong, evidence that when it was executed the contractor had not performed.

4. Principal and surety ⚡138 — Compliance with arbitration clause of the contract not condition precedent to action on bond.

It was not necessary that an arbitration clause in a contract be complied with as a condition precedent to bringing of an action on the contractor's bond, the bond containing no arbitration clause, and not being worded to oust the courts of right to entertain the case.

5. Arbitration and award ⚡8 — Arbitration clause not construed to oust courts of jurisdiction where it can be avoided.

An arbitration clause of a contract will not be construed as ousting the courts of jurisdiction unless such construction is inevitable, so that, unless the clause is made a condition precedent by express words or necessary implication, it will be construed as merely collateral to the liability clause and is no bar to an action without an award.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. H. Langdon, Judge.

Action by the Oakdale Irrigation District against T. K. Beard and the Aetna Accident & Liability Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Dennett, of Modesto, Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, and Dennett & Zion, of Modesto, for appellants.

Griffin, Carlson & Boone, of Modesto, for respondent.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to recover a money judgment upon a bond executed by the defendant T. K. Beard, as principal, and the defendant Aetna Accident & Liability Company, as surety therein.

The record shows that on the 25th day of February, 1913, the defendant Beard entered into a contract with the plaintiff in and by which he agreed to construct for the plaintiff certain ditches, pipes, etc., as part of an irrigation system belonging to the plaintiff. The work referred to was the building of the Paulsell canal, Paulsell laterals, the Orange Blossom laterals, the Grey laterals, the Clavey siphon and Booster plant, the River road siphon, and the South lateral siphon, according to plans and specifications prepared by George L. Dillman, engineer for plaintiff. The defendant Beard agreed to do said work in a workmanlike manner and to the satisfaction and approval of said engineer and of the board of directors of plaintiff "in conformity in all respects with the annexed specifications, which are hereby made a part of this contract." The specifications are quite full and complete, and are annexed to the contract. The defendant Beard was to receive for performing the work specified in such contract a sum of money estimated to be about $85,616. Before entering upon the work he was to give a bond, to be approved by the board of directors of the plaintiff, in an amount estimated in the contract, based upon a percentage of what the work would cost as per the specifications. Having executed the contract and the bond, the defendant Beard proceeded with the construction work agreed to be done by him, and continued therein until on or about the 15th day of May, 1914. At that time he appeared before the board of directors of the plaintiff and expressed his desire to have the large bond which he had been carrying canceled and a new bond given in lieu thereof in the sum of $10,000 and an additional payment made to him of $10,000, it being claimed by him at the time that there was something more than that amount due to him for the work performed. This proposition was accepted by plaintiff, and a new bond executed with the defendant Aetna Accident & Liability Company, as surety. The $10,000 requested was paid over to him and the old bond released. The new bond, and the one upon which this suit is brought, stated quite fully the mutual understanding of the parties as to the conditions then existing. It recites that there is now due from the plaintiff to the defendant Beard on the contract, dated February 25, 1913, the sum of $11,280; that such portions of said work as had been tested are unsatisfactory to the board and its engineer, because of small leaks that had developed; that Beard desired a payment of $10,000 be made to him, the balance of said contract price to be held by plaintiff until Beard should complete said work in a workmanlike manner to the satisfaction and approval of the engineer of said district and the board of directors of plaintiff "in all respects in conformity with the specifications in the original contract." It recited that plaintiff was willing to make said payments of $10,000 upon the defendant Beard giving a new bond in the sum of $10,000 "conditioned that he will faithfully perform and complete all of said concrete pipes which were constructed under said contract at the earliest possible moment, and that said concrete pipes will all be constructed and repaired within three months after the time of said test." The bond was to be void if the defendant Beard complied with the terms and conditions of a certain resolution of the plaintiff's board of directors, passed May 5, 1914, otherwise to remain in full force and effect. The resolution referred to provides for the payment of the $10,000 upon the execution of the bond conditioned as subsequently on the bond stated. Thereafter, this action was brought upon the bond last referred to; it being alleged in the complaint with much fullness that the defendant Beard had failed to perform his contract and failed to complete said work to the satisfaction of the board or of its engineer, and failed to complete it in accordance with the terms and specifications of the original contract. The defective construction was alleged to be in that part of the work designated as the Clavey siphon and Booster plant.

The court finds that this work had not been completed in accordance with the contract and the specifications attached thereto, and that by reason of such failure plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $10,000 and that it would cost the plaintiff at least $10,000 to complete said Clavey siphon and Booster plant according to the specifications annexed to said contract, and entered judgment against both defendants for that amount. This appeal is from the judgment.

[1] 1. The appellant claims that the court accepted the amount of the bond as the measure of damages, and that in doing so it committed a very serious error. An examination of the record convinces us that this contention cannot be sustained. It is true the judgment is for the same amount the bond was given for, but an examination of the record shows that this is merely a coincidence. The court could not render any valid judgment against the surety company for more than the penal sum of the bond. The finding of the court that it would cost the plaintiff at least $10,000 to complete the work according to the specifications has evidence to support it. The witness Finney testified:

"Q. Now what in your opinion would be the value of the Siphon as it now stands? A. Well, it would be—I can't just state right now the exact cost for the reason that the pipe isn't doing its duty and as time goes on it will do less, so that in getting at the cost, about the only way that I could figure the value would be that there would have to be as much money spent on it as the original cost."

The total contract price for this part of the work was about $23,335.67.

The witness Burton Smith testified:

"The condition of the pipe is bad due to the fact that it has many leaks in it, and the fact that there is not a foot of the pipe but what—the length of it but what leaks."

He testified that, in his opinion, the present pipe could not be fixed:

"Q. You can't make any improvements in that pipe so it would carry the water without it costing as much as if you laid new pipe, or the original cost of the pipe? A. I think that it would be fully the original cost of the pipe. In my opinion it would be necessary for the district to put in a new pipe."

There is other evidence as to the defective condition of the pipe, in addition to what has been referred to, to show that the findings of the court as to the defective condition of the pipe and the amount it would cost to put it in good condition have evidence to support them.

2. Appellant claims that the original contract between the plaintiff and Beard is void. It is not clearly stated in the brief for what reason the original contract was void. This action is not brought upon the original contract, but upon the new bond. By its terms the plaintiff paid to Beard $10,000 upon his written promise to perform certain work, and his bond was that if he did not perform this work the bond should be good. He did not perform it, and therefore he and his bondsmen became legally obligated to make payment to the plaintiff. The original contract is referred to as containing a description of the work that the defendant Beard was to perform, and to this extent only it has a bearing upon the decision of the case.

[2] Conceding that there may have been certain defects in the steps leading up to the making of the original contract, and that the law was not in all respects complied with, still, such defects are no defense to a suit upon the bond involved herein.

The case of Peoples Lumber Co. v. Gillard.

136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576, is decisive of this matter, wherein it is said:

"It appeared that after the bids were all in for the building it was found that they exceeded the money provided—to wit, $7,000—and the bids were all rejected, and the plans were then gone over and certain changes made to bring the cost down to $7,000, and Gillard and Leary agreed to build the structure for that sum without further advertising, and thereupon the contract in question was made and the sureties then signed the bond. As to these facts it is sufficient to say that they do not furnish any ground of defense. The bond was executed with reference to the contract annexed to it, and not with reference to any advertised proposals.

"If the board had no authority to make the contract without re-advertising for bids, that fact would not discharge the sureties from their obligations under this bond."

3. Appellants claim that Beard performed the conditions of the original contract, and that the finding of the court that he did not is not sustained by the evidence.

In the bond upon which this suit is brought (and the bond is signed by both defendants), it is recited that—

"Whereas of such portions of said contract as has been tested certain parts are unsatisfactory to the board of directors and the engineer of said district, because of the fact that small leaks have developed."

It is also in said bond recited that plaintiff is willing to pay Beard $10,000 if he will execute a bond "conditioned that he will faithfully perform and complete all of said concrete pipes which were constructed under said contract."

[3] If he had fully performed his original contract, as now claimed, he was entitled to be paid therefor the amount agreed upon without giving a new bond conditioned that he would complete it. The recitals of the bond signed by the defendants are conclusive, or at least very strong, evidence that at the time it was executed the defendant Beard had not constructed the work in accordance with the terms of the contract.

4. The original contract contained the provision:

"If in the execution of this contract there shall be any ruling of the engineer alleged by either party hereto to be erroneous or unfair, each party shall immediately appoint an arbitrator, and the arbiters so appointed shall within four days after their appointment, unless such time is extended by mutual agreement of the parties hereto, render their written agreement in the premises."

Counsel claims that this clause in the contract must be complied with as a condition precedent to the bringing of an action. There are several answers to this contention:

[4] (1) This action is not brought on the contract, but the bond, and the bond contained no arbitration clause, and is not so worded as to oust the courts of the right to entertain the case. There are no express words making the submission to arbitration a condition precedent to the bringing of the suit and no language used therein from which such intent can be inferred.

[5] (2) In Ruling Case Law, vol. 2, p. 363, it is said:

"But the courts generally will not construe an arbitration clause as ousting them of their jurisdiction unless such construction is inevitable, and consequently when the arbitration clause is not made a condition precedent by express words or by necessary implication, it will be construed as merely collateral to the liability clause, and so no bar to an action in the courts without an award."

See, also, Hamilton v. Home Ins. Co., 137 U. S. 370, 11 Sup. Ct. 133, 34 L. Ed. 708, where the same ruling is stated in very clear and strong language.

We have now noticed all the points raised by appellant upon which he claims a reversal of the judgment should be had, and it is our opinion that none of them is sufficient to justify a reversal of the decision of the lower court. The findings are supported by the evidence, and, no reversible error appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

NEWELL-MURDOCH REALTY CO. v.
WICKHAM et al. (S. F. 8725.)(Supreme Court of California. May 22, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 21, 1920.)1. Evidence ⌘574—Conclusions and probabilities not substantial contradiction of positive testimony.

Witness' statements of conclusions and probabilities of information having been given cannot be considered as a substantial contradiction of positive testimony that it was not given, so as to sustain a finding that it was given.

2. Brokers ⌘31—Must inform principal of interest on the side of the proposed purchaser.

Real estate agents when becoming agents for sale are under duty to inform their principal of their being financially interested on the side of the proposed purchaser.

3. Brokers ⌘94—Sale may be avoided for failure of agent to disclose his interest in purchaser.

Contract of sale may be avoided by the vendors because of the broker, their agent, failing to inform them, as known by the purchaser, that he was financially interested on the side of the purchaser.

4. Brokers ⚡31—Must inform principal that they are stockholders in proposed purchaser.

Interest of brokers as stockholders in the proposed purchaser is such an interest as to require them to inform their principal, the vendor, thereof.

5. Corporations ⚡428(6) — Charged with knowledge of its managing officers making sale to it as agents of vendor.

The brokers who made sale to a corporation being its managing officers, it is charged with knowledge of the equities of the vendor, because of the brokers not informing him of their interests as stockholders in the purchaser.

6. Specific performance ⚡12—Avoidance of contract by agent not disclosing interest available as defense without revocation.

Option of vendor to avoid contract of sale because of the brokers, his agents, not disclosing to him their interests as stockholders in the purchaser, remains complete till purchaser brings action for specific performance, and then is available as a defense without prior revocation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company against Jessie E. Wickham and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Ornbaun & Fraser and John W. Preston, both of San Francisco, Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, Lovett K. Fraser, of San Francisco, and Abe P. Leach, of Oakland, for appellants.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment directing the specific performance of an agreement to exchange real property, alleged to have been made between the plaintiff and the defendants.

The complaint alleged, in substance, that the agreement to exchange real properties, which is set forth in full therein, was made between the parties on August 11, 1916; that it was fair and reasonable in its terms; that plaintiff had offered to perform; but that the defendants, although duly requested so to do, had refused to perform their part thereof. The property of plaintiff consisted of a number of lots in the Forest Hill tract in San Francisco. The property of the defendants, which it is claimed they agreed to exchange for said property of plaintiff, consisted of an improved corner lot at Jones and Jackson streets in San Francisco.

We are of the opinion that the findings and judgment are contrary to and unsupported by the evidence upon certain points essential to the judgment. The question involved is the duty of the agent of the vendor to disclose to such vendor everything within his knowledge relating to the advisability of the sale of the property which the agent is employed to sell for the vendor and whether or not a sale can be enforced by the vendee against such vendor when the agent who makes the sale is himself interested with the vendee in accomplishing the same, but fails to fully inform the principal of such interest and the vendee had knowledge of such failure at the time.

During the time of the transactions under inquiry the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company was a corporation, having 2,000 shares of stock outstanding, and the Newell-Murdoch Company was a partnership of which R. C. Newell and William C. Murdoch, Jr., were the only members. This partnership was also the owner of 1,050 shares of the stock of the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company being a majority of the outstanding issue thereof. Newell was the president and Murdoch the secretary of the corporation, and under the resolutions and by-laws of the corporation they were in control of its affairs and were authorized to contract in its behalf for the purchase or sale of real estate. They were also the actual managers of the corporation and in control of its affairs. The three defendants were brother and sisters and owners in common of the Jackson and Jones streets property. An agent of the firm of Newell-Murdoch Company proposed to them an even exchange of the Forest Hill lots for their property aforesaid. Because of this proposal, the defendants visited the office of the Newell-Murdoch Company in San Francisco on August 11, 1916, and there signed a proposal to make such exchange. Murdoch then produced a blank form of agreement for exchange which they duly filled up and it was then signed by the defendants. This document in form was a proposal to be signed by one party to exchange the property, followed by a blank form of an acceptance of the proposal by the other party. The defendants signed the part constituting the proposal. It provided that "the undersigned hereby authorize Newell-Murdoch Company to act as their agents in negotiating an exchange, and agree that if they shall secure an acceptance of the above proposition to exchange the above described property on the above terms," each party should furnish an abstract of title within ten days and that the defendants should pay Newell-Murdoch Company $525 as commission for such services and "it is understood that said agent may also act as agent for the owners of the above secondly described property, from whom they may also receive a commission." The said agents were allowed four days within which to procure the acceptance of the proposal by the owners of the Forest Hill lots. This document, so signed, was delivered by the defendants to said Newell-

Murdoch Company, as agents as aforesaid, about 4 o'clock in the afternoon of August 11, at which time a carbon copy thereof was delivered by said agents to the defendants. The part of the document providing for the acceptance of the owners was not then signed or filled in. No consideration was paid or rendered at the time of this transaction. Upon reaching home the defendants decided not to carry out the contract, whereupon Jessie E. Wickham, wrote and mailed a letter to the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company, stating that she could not sign any deed for her undivided interest in the Jackson street property and "hence we will consider the matter closed." All this occurred on a Saturday. The letter was received by Newell-Murdoch Realty Company early on the following Monday morning. The Newell-Murdoch Realty Company and the Newell-Murdoch Company were both managed and operated by Newell and Murdoch, and the offices of the two concerns were in the same rooms. Immediately after the departure of the defendants from the office, Murdoch filled up the form for the proposed acceptance on behalf of the plaintiff and signed the same as secretary thereof. It was afterwards signed by Newell as president, but whether before or after the receipt of the letter from Jessie E. Wickham revoking the agreement does not appear.

[1, 2] During the interview in which the proposal was made by the defendants, they were not informed by Newell-Murdoch Company, or either of them, that the Newell-Murdoch Company owned stock in the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company, or that that firm had any interest in the property in the Forest Hill lots, except as agents for the owner. It is claimed by the plaintiff that there is a conflict of evidence on this point. Each of the three defendants testified positively that no statement of that sort was made and that they knew nothing of the interest of Newell and Murdoch in the plaintiff corporation until the suit was begun. Murdoch, when questioned about the matter as a witness and asked if he told defendants that he had any interest in that corporation, said:

"I don't know—I don't believe that the subject was touched on at all. I don't remember that it was."

Asked if he disclosed to them what connection the partnership had with the corporation, he said:

"I don't know that we did. It may have come out in the general conversation; it probably did; I told them we were interested in the company I am sure. I didn't say to what extent. Our names were—the names were exactly similar; it was generally known, and they knew, I am sure, that Newell-Murdoch Realty Company was the product of this company."

These statements of the witness, which are but statements, of conclusions and probabilities, following his emphatic statement that the subject was not touched upon, cannot be considered as a substantial contradiction of the positive testimony of the defendants that nothing of the kind was said. Furthermore there were other statements made in the course of conversation indicating that they held out to the defendants throughout the interview that it would be necessary for Newell-Murdoch Company to enter into some negotiations with the owners. Neither before nor after the delivery of the proposal appointing the firm agents of defendants to negotiate the exchange did that firm disclose the fact that they were themselves officers of the Newell-Murdoch Realty Company and that they could, as such, then and there immediately close the transaction. There is no pretense whatever that they ever stated to the defendants that they were the owners of the majority of the stock of the corporation and to that extent interested in the purchase of the property and personally benefited by the transaction. The similarity of names did not put the defendants on inquiry, under these circumstances. The moment the firm became agents for defendants, if not before, its duty arose to inform defendants of the interest it had in the corporation, which was adverse to the interests of the defendants. The findings were contrary to these facts, and to that extent they are not sustained by the evidence.

[3] A contract made under these circumstances cannot be specifically enforced. Where an agent is employed by a vendor to negotiate a sale, and he is himself financially interested on the side of the vendee, by reason of a direct or indirect property interest which he has or will have in the property when it is acquired by the vendee, or in the price to be paid by the vendee, he must disclose that interest fully to the principal and the principal with full knowledge of all the facts known to the agent, bearing upon its advisability, and of such interest, must act freely and of his own volition in making the deal, and if the agent fails to make such disclosure, where, as here, the vendee is aware of such failure, the sale may be avoided at the option of the vendor. A similar question arose in Burke v. Bours, 92 Cal. 108, 28 Pac. 57. The court said:

"Where a person buys for himself as the agent of his principal, danger surrounds the best interest of the principal, and it is the policy of equity to remove every temptation from the agent, by rigidly discountenancing all such transactions; and under the broad principles heretofore referred to, relating to the duties and obligations of trustees and agents, defendant's purchase of the realty cannot be sanctioned. * * * It matters not that there was no fraud in this transaction, or that no injury resulted to Arguello from the sale. The rule is intended to prevent the possibility of wrong; and assuming that Bours paid full value for the property, and even acted in entire good faith throughout the transaction, still, such facts form no defense where the purchase was made by the agent without knowledge of his principal. * * * It necessarily follows that he is not the vendee under an executed contract of sale, is not in a position to enforce specific performance, and possesses no equity sufficient to defeat plaintiff's right to the recovery of the possession of this tract of land."

In that case the vendor had brought suit in ejectment against a subagent of his own selling agent, which subagent had purchased the property for himself, without informing the seller that he was doing so. He had paid in full the purchase price asked and he set up this equity in opposition to the suit in ejectment by the seller. The same question arose in Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 29, 28 Pac. 790, where the court laid down the rule concerning the relations of the principal and agent, trustee and beneficiary, as follows:

"For the reason that it is against public policy to permit persons occupying fiduciary relations to be placed in such a position that the influence of selfish motives may be a temptation so great as to overpower their duty and lead to a betrayal of their trust, the rule is unyielding that a trustee shall not, under any circumstances, be allowed to have any dealings in the trust property with himself, or acquire any interest therein. Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for the best interest of the beneficiary, but will set the transaction aside, at the mere option of the cestui que trust."

The proposition is too well settled to require further discussion or authority.

[4] A stockholder in a corporation has a beneficial interest, in proportion to the amount of his stock, in all the property of the corporation. While he has not the legal title thereto he has an equitable interest therein. It has been expressly held that this interest is sufficient to defeat an action for specific performance where the corporation, as the purchaser, is seeking to enforce a contract of sale negotiated by its own agent, acting as the agent of the vendor, whereby the latter agreed to sell to the corporation. Foss Investment Co. v. Ater, 49 Wash. 446, 95 Pac. 1017. In that case the court said:

"An agent to sell cannot himself become the purchaser directly or indirectly, without the knowledge and consent of his principal. Louis Foss, defendant's agent, was so closely identified with, and in such complete control of the plaintiff corporation, that practically he would have become the sole beneficiary of all profits and benefits that might accrue to the plaintiff as purchaser."

In that case Foss, the agent, was the owner of 998 of the 1,000 shares issued by the plaintiff company. In no other respect is there any difference between that case and this. The extent of the interest, however, is not to be weighed or measured in deciding a case of this kind. The agent must disclose his interest, whatever it be, or the deal will be voidable by the vendor whose property is the subject of the sale.

[5, 6] It matters not whether the revocation of the authority by the defendant Wickham was received by the plaintiff company before its president had signed the acceptance or afterward. The managing officers of the corporation were the persons who, as agents, procured the proposal to be executed. The corporation, therefore, must be presumed to have had full notice of everything which was known to said persons, if any notice was necessary under the circumstances. The corporation is chargeable with full knowledge of the equities of the defendants in the matter and can no more be allowed to enforce the contract than could the agents who attempted to negotiate the same. No revocation of the proposal was necessary to the defense pleaded. The option to avoid the contract remained complete until the action was begun and was then available as a defense to the action.

For these reasons the judgment of the court below cannot be sustained. Several other questions are argued in the briefs, but this conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1920.)

Divorce — 124—Evidence held to show plaintiff wife at fault in associating with men.

In a wife's action for divorce for extreme cruelty, evidence that the wife was at fault, in that through association with her sister she acquired the habit of visiting cafés in company with men without her husband's knowledge or consent, remaining away from home until late at night, held sufficient to justify denial of divorce.

Action for divorce by Louisa M. Knapp against Michael Knapp. From judgment denying decree, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William L. Kuehn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, who was sitting pro tempore at the time of the hearing and order for submission of this cause, in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN of this court, is adopted as the opinion of this court in the cause.

This is an appeal from a judgment denying the plaintiff a decree of divorce, her alleged cause of action being based on the ground of extreme cruelty. A trial being had, the court found that the defendant had committed none of the acts of cruelty charged, except that on one occasion, when assaulted by the plaintiff, he took such physical action as was necessary to compel her to desist, without, however, inflicting any injury upon her. On the other hand, the court found, as alleged by the defendant in effect, that much of the domestic trouble between him and his wife was caused by a sister of the latter, who came to live with them at their home about a year before the commencement of this action. The evidence in the case showed that this woman, though married, held herself out to be single, assumed a false name, and conducted herself in a manner widely at variance from the standard generally accepted as incumbent upon a married woman; that she exercised over the plaintiff an evil influence, as a result of which the plaintiff acquired the habit of visiting cafés in company with men and without her husband's knowledge or consent, remaining away from home until late and unusual hours of the night.

The sole point made by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court. In this we emphatically disagree, but think a review of the evidence unnecessary. Some of the testimony given by the plaintiff for the purpose of sustaining certain of the allegations of cruelty was of a sordid character, and found no credence with the trial court, and justly so, the charges to which such testimony referred being apparently made for the purpose of intimidating the defendant in defending the action. Under the circumstances of this case we think it sufficient to say that we have carefully read the evidence, and are satisfied that it abundantly sustains the findings of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

KIPP v. REED. (L. A. 6072.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1920.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 948(1) — Plaintiff did not waive benefit of estoppel by failure to plead former judgment.

Plaintiff in an action to quiet title did not waive the benefit of any estoppel in his favor against the defendant, which might have been available to him under a judgment in a former action against the same parties to quiet title, by failing to plead such judgment; the defendant still being in possession of the premises.

2. Judgment $\S$ 950(1)—In former case between same parties admissible as muniment of title.

Plaintiff, in an action to quiet title, was properly permitted to introduce in evidence the judgment roll in a former action against the same defendant to quiet title, though not pleaded; such former judgment being a muniment in plaintiff's chain of title, and admissible as such, defendant still being in possession of the premises.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Sylvester Kipp against David C. Reed, also known as D. C. Reed. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles C. Crouch and Crouch & Chambers, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Abram Rosenthal and Sylvester Kipp, both of San Diego, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, who was sitting pro tempore at the time of the hearing and order for submission of this cause, in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN of this court, is adopted as the opinion of this court in the cause:

This action was brought to quiet title to the lands described in the complaint. The defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint, wherein he alleged himself to be the owner and in the possession of the premises and he prayed for judgment accordingly. At the trial the only evidence presented upon the issue of ownership was that offered by plaintiff. No evidence was offered by defendant. To sustain his alleged title, plaintiff introduced certain United States patents issued to defendant to the land in controversy. Over objection, he then offered in evidence a judgment roll in a former action to quiet title brought by him against the defendant concerning the identical lands described in complaint herein. Plaintiff then rested his case, whereupon defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. Judgment went for plaintiff. As ground for reversal, it is claimed that plaintiff waived the benefit of any estoppel in his favor against the defendant, which might have been available to him, arising out of the former adjudication of the same issue between the same parties, for the reason that he did not plead or rely upon such judgment.

[1, 2] Under these circumstances, appellant claims the question of title should be relitigated upon the merits, without the aid of the former judgment. We see no merit in this contention. The former judgment between the parties is dated July, 1909. The complaint in the present action was filed July 24, 1918. The verified answer of defendant alleges that at the commencement of the action he was the owner and in the possession of the premises. There is nothing before us to show why plaintiff did not rely upon his judgment as an estoppel against the defendant, but the recital in defendant's pleadings as to possession and ownership would indicate that defendant claimed some new right or title that had been acquired by him subsequent to the rendition of the former judgment. His pleadings, however, do not disclose the source of any new title, and he introduced no evidence upon the subject. But, in any event, so far as the record shows, plaintiff was entitled to maintain this action. In Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Purcell, 77 Cal. 69, 18 Pac. 886, it is held that the fact that a former judgment in ejectment was given against a defendant in favor of a plaintiff did not prevent such plaintiff from bringing a second action against the defendant, if the latter was in possession of the property. The admission of the judgment roll in evidence did not, as claimed, constitute error. It was a muniment in plaintiff's chain of title, and admissible as such. Chapman v. Moore, 151 Cal. 509, 91 Pac. 324, 121 Am. St. Rep. 130.

The conclusion we have reached makes it unnecessary to pass upon plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

In the matter of the estate of Margaret Hall, deceased. From a portion of the decree of final distribution, Michael O'Brien, by and through Eugene W. Levy, his guardian, appeals. Affirmed.

Shelton & Levy and Steinhart, McAtee & Levy, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanislaus A. Riley and Robert C. Porter, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from that portion of the decree of final distribution in the estate of Margaret Hall which directs that the debts and expenses of administration be paid exclusively out of certain residuary legacies which failed of disposition by reason of the death of some of the residuary legatees prior to that of the testatrix. The will of decedent, after creating a number of specific and general legacies, contains the following residuary clause:

"All the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, I give, bequeath and devise in equal shares to the following ten persons. * * *

Three of the ten persons named predeceased the testatrix. As they were not related to the testatrix, and there was no provision in the will for the disposition of their shares in the event of their death, the legacies lapsed, and as to three-tenths of the residue deceased died intestate. Estate of Kunkler, 163 Cal. 797, 127 Pac. 43. The trial court directed that the debts and expenses of administration be paid entirely out of the three lapsed legacies. Appellant is the brother of the testatrix and entitled as one of the heirs at law to participate in the lapsed three-tenths of the residue. The sole question presented on appeal is whether the debts and expenses of administration should be paid entirely out of the lapsed residue, or whether the shares of the seven surviving residuary legatees should abate equally with the three lapsed shares which go to the heirs at law.

Appellant asserts that the charges against the estate must be paid from the general assets of the estate, that it is a solecism to speak of paying debts and charges out of part of the residue because the residue cannot be ascertained until all debts and expenses of administration as well as legacies have been paid, and that, by charging the debts against the lapsed portion of the residue, the decree has, in effect, distributed to the surviving residuary legatees a substantial part of the shares which lapsed.

[1] The general rule is that property not disposed of by the will should be first resorted to for the payment of all demands against the estate. This is so for the reason that the law endeavors to carry out the intent of the testator as far as possible, and therefore property not disposed of by the will should be so applied as to render it certain that the dispositions actually made by the testator will be effective. In re Bradley's Will, 123 Wis. 186, 101 N. W. 393, 3 Ann. Cas. 716. There are cases which hold, however, that, when the undisposed property constitutes part of the residue, there is an exception to the general rule that the demands against the estate are paid out of the property undisposed of by the will. In re Bradley's Will, supra; Tretheway v. Helyar, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 53; Eyre v. Marsden, 4 My. & Cr. 231, 243, 41 Eng. Rep. 91. This exception does not prevail in California.

Section 1516 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1358 of the Civil Code of California make the entire estate chargeable with the debts and expenses of administration "except as otherwise provided" in the Civil Code or Code of Civil Procedure. In the absence of any other statutory regulation in regard to the payment of debts, it is apparent that all legacies would be reduced in equal proportion by the charges thus imposed. These sections, however, are supplemented and modified by other Code sections; the obvious aim of the arrangement being to satisfy the charges against the estate with the least possible interference with the express dispositions of the testator. Accordingly, section 1563 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains the provision that "specific devises or legacies are exempt from such liability if it appears to the court necessary to carry into effect the intention of the testator, and there is other sufficient estate." Section 1562 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"If the provision made by the will, or the estate appropriated therefor, is insufficient to pay the debts, expenses of administration, and family expenses, that portion of the estate not devised or disposed of by the will, if any, must be appropriated and disposed of for that purpose, according to the provisions of this chapter."

The most specific provision for the order of resort for the payment of debts and expenses of administration is contained in section 1359 of the Civil Code, and that order is as follows:

"One. The property which is expressly appropriated by the will for the payment of the debts;

"Two. Property not disposed of by the will;

"Three. Property which is devised or bequeathed to a residuary legatee;

"Four. Property which is not specifically devised or bequeathed; and,

"Five. All other property ratably."

A lapsed legacy, whether residuary or otherwise, is property not disposed of by will, and it is for that reason alone that it goes to the heirs. Section 1343, Civ. Code. It would therefore seem in consonance with the above Code provisions and the underlying theory of distribution and administration that the charges against the estate should be paid entirely from the lapsed residuary legacies.

The theoretical objection urged against this conclusion is that there can be no "residue" in an estate until all charges against the estate, as well as all specific and general legacies, have been discharged and satisfied. That this is not the necessary connotation of "residue" is evidenced by the Code definition of the term "residuary legacy." Section 1357, subd. 4, of the Civil Code defines a residuary legacy as follows:

"A residuary legacy embraces only that which remains after all the bequests of the will are discharged."

In other words, "residue" in its broadest sense includes all the property which is not otherwise devised or bequeathed. It is true that the term "residue" is often applied to "that part of it [the estate] left after paying the debts of testator and the expenses of administration and undisposed of by the rest of the will." Page on Wills, § 507. This is frequently the significance of the word, for the reason that in many cases there is a general residuary clause into which all of the property otherwise undisposed of falls. O'Connor v. Murphy, 147 Cal. 148, 153, 81 Pac. 406. In such a case there is no property undisposed of by the will, and, if there is no provision for the payment of debts in the will, property which would otherwise go to the residuary legatees is, under the law, appropriated to the payment of debts. However, section 1359 of the Civil Code, as we have seen, provides, in effect, that if there is any property not disposed of by the will, that is to be taken for the payment of debts before the property which is bequeathed to a residuary legatee. Under the definition adopted by section 1357, it is not necessary to deduct the charges against the estate before the residue is ascertainable.

[2] There is no inconsistency, therefore, in holding that portions of the residue undisposed of by the will must be used for the payment of charges before resort may be had to the residuary legacies effectually devised or bequeathed. The fallacy in the position of appellant arises from a failure to distinguish between the distribution of the property in accordance with the terms of the will and the payment of debts as provided by law. The court first determines the rights of the parties under the will, and then applies the law with relation to the payment of indebtedness. The latter is purely an incident of administration enforced by the law, and should so operate as to cause the minimum amount of disturbance to the rights of the parties under the will.

The charges must be paid entirely from the property undisposed of by the will, namely, three-tenths of the residue, and the decree is therefore affirmed.

WILSON v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1920.)

1. Insurance — 451(1)—Clause in accident policy that it should not cover injury resulting from explosives did not apply only to voluntary exposure.

Clause in an accident policy, providing that it should not cover injury resulting wholly or partly from explosives of any kind, held not to apply only to voluntary exposure to explosives.

2. Insurance — 146(3)—Ambiguities in accident policies construed against insurer.

Ambiguities in accident policies are to be construed against the insurer.

3. Insurance — 452 — Injury occasioned by "wreckage" of passenger car and not explosion causing wreckage.

Under an accident policy, providing that it should not cover injury resulting from explosions, but should cover injury resulting from "wreckage" of a passenger car, where there was an explosion in toilet room, causing the walls thereof to burst and injure insured, who was sitting in the interior of the car, the injury was the result of the "wreckage" of the car and not of the explosion; the word "wreckage" implying that the car is a passive instrumentality, acted upon by some force which wrecks it.

4. Insurance — 530—Recovery could be had only on one daily ticket accident policy.

Only recovery on one ticket policy could be had by a passenger, although he had purchased two daily ticket policies, which overlapped at the time of the injury, where the policies provided that "insurance on any person under ticket policies is limited," etc., naming the amount of the policy.

5. Customs and usages — 19(2)—Subsequent acts not competent to prove uniform custom.

Evidence that an accident insurance company sold more than one daily ticket policy to a passenger in December, 1917, was not competent to show that it was the custom in 1916 to sell more than one daily ticket policy to a passenger.

6. Insurance — 530—Issuance of several accident tickets held not to estop insurer from limiting liabilities to one ticket; custom not influencing action does not estop.

An insurer engaged in selling daily ticket accident policies to passengers was not estopped by custom of selling more than one such policy to a traveler from setting up as a defense in an action on two policies a clause in the policies, limiting liability to the amount specified in one of them, unless the conduct of the insured in taking out more than one policy was in some manner influenced thereby.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by John H. Wilson against the Travelers' Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Coogan & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. Ernest Phillips, of Oakland, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff recovered from defendant for bodily injuries, accidentally received, double weekly indemnity on each of two one-day ticket policies of accident insurance purchased by him for 25 cents each. The first was purchased at 6:30 p. m., June 29, 1916, and the second at 6:15 p. m., June 30, 1916, from a ticket agent of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. The accident occurred at 7:30 p. m., June 30, 1916, while plaintiff was aboard a Southern Pacific passenger train. As each policy by its terms expired at midnight of the next day after date, both were in effect at the time of the accident. The amount recovered on each policy was $1,300, being double the weekly indemnity of $12.50 for 52 weeks. The defendant appeals from the judgment. The only fact in dispute is as to whether the injury resulted from an explosion within the meaning of that term as used in the policy. All other questions involve the interpretation of the policies and their application to the admitted facts. The plaintiff, a passenger, was seated in a passenger car which was standing at the Southern Pacific Company's Sixteenth street depot, in Oakland, when a violent explosion in the toilet room occurred, by which the car was wrecked. The trial court finds that—

"In and by the wreckage of said passenger car and by reason of the same and as a result thereof the plaintiff sustained bodily injuries;" "that such external and internal injuries of plaintiff were occasioned wholly and solely by the wreckage of the said passenger car."

The policies contained the usual terms insuring the holder against injuries effected by accidental means, "subject to the conditions herein contained, to wit." Then follow clauses lettered consecutively from (a) to (k). Clauses (a), (b), (c), fix the amount of insurance to be paid for injuries. The double indemnity clause (d) is as follows, to wit:

"(d) If the insured be a male, and such injuries shall be caused by the wreckage or burning of a railway passenger car or vessel licensed for the transportation of passengers, provided in either case by a common carrier and propelled by mechanical power, while the insured is a passenger and actually within the car or on board the vessel, then the company will pay double the amount otherwise payable under clause (a), (b) or (c) of this policy."

Clause (g) contains the provision with reference to explosives, relied on by appellant to defeat plaintiff. This clause reads as follows:

"(g) This insurance shall not cover disappearance nor injuries of which there is no visible contusion or wound on the exterior of the body of the insured, nor shall it cover accident, injury, disability or death resulting wholly or partly, from any of the following, to wit: Voluntary overexertion, or voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, medical or surgical treatment, hernia, disease in any form, fits, vertigo or sleepwalking, gas or poison in any form or manner or contact with poisonous substances, sunstroke or freezing, firearms, fireworks, or explosives of any kind, horse, automobile or bicycle racing, aerial navigation, lacrosse, football, dueling or fighting, war or riot, nor shall this insurance cover suicide sane or insane, or injuries, fatal or nonfatal, inflicted intentionally by the insured or by any other person, sane or insane, or sustained by the insured while insane or intoxicated, while violating law, resisting arrest or fleeing from justice, or while entering or leaving any moving conveyance or trying so to do, or happening while in or on any part thereof not provided for occupancy of passengers or while on the steps or platform of any moving car (street cars excepted) or while on the right of way or bridge of any railway."

[1] Respondent contends that this clause should be construed to apply only to the voluntary exposure to explosives. The policy is hardly susceptible of such construction. Omitting inapplicable clauses the proviso reads:

"Nor shall it cover injury resulting wholly or partly from any of the following, to wit: * * * firearms, fireworks, or explosives of any kind."

The punctuation as well as the context remove these clauses from the operation of the words "voluntary exposure."

[2, 3] The next question arises from the fact that the plaintiff was injured by the wreckage of a passenger car, to which clause (d) applies. This clause being specific and applicable by its terms to the manner in which the plaintiff was injured, it is claimed that it should control the general exception in clause (g) of injury by explosives. The point is not free from difficulty. "Wreckage" is defined as "the act of wrecking." The word implies that the car is a passive instrumentality, acted upon by some force which wrecks it. This force must always be a proximate cause of the injury. Therefore where an explosive wrecks the car, it is proper to say that an injury resulting from the wreckage of the car was "caused" by the explosion. This would be true if the explosion was only sufficient to derail a moving train. The difficulty with such a construction arises from the fact that it would completely nullify clause (d) which is evidently intended to secure the patronage of intending passengers. If we must look for the cause of the injuries to the first cause, it would never be the wreckage of the car, which is itself a result, and not a cause. In the case at bar, if the car had remained intact, that is, if the walls of the toilet room had been sufficiently strong to resist the explosion, or to have directed its force away from the interior of the car, the plaintiff would have suffered no greater injury than a bystander at great gun target practice. The wreckage of the car intervened between the explosion and the plaintiff. The defendant has chosen to use the phrase "wreckage of the car" as a cause of injury for which they hold themselves responsible. Although the explosion was the proximate cause of the injury, it was, by the peculiar terms of the policy, made a remote cause, or secondary cause where the wreckage of the car intervened. No doubt if an explosive bomb had been placed in the plaintiff's lap and there exploded, killing him and wrecking the car, the wreckage of the car would not be a "cause" of the accident within the meaning of the policy. But where it was necessary for the explosive to first destroy or wreck the car to reach the passenger, or where parts of the wrecked car striking the passenger cause the injury, the terms of the policy would warrant a recovery. The defendant is privileged to frame its contracts of insurance in any terms it may choose, and in the absence of ambiguity the courts enforce such contracts as written. But they are offered to the public, and are intended to be sufficiently attractive to secure purchasers. The established rule of construction of such contracts require us to settle the ambiguity arising from the inapt phraseology "caused by the wreckage or burning of a railway passenger car" against the insurance company, and therefore to hold that where the injury is caused by the "wreckage" of the car which is in turn caused by the explosion of an explosive, the insured can recover under clause (d), for the reason that such "wreckage" is itself a "cause" of injury within the meaning of the latter clause. In view of the foregoing conclusion, in which we have assumed that the explosion was that of an "explosive" within the meaning of that term as used in the policy, it is unnecessary to consider the points made with reference to the evidence or findings in that connection.

[4-6] It is contended by appellant that the plaintiff in any event is entitled to recover for his injuries on only one policy, and on the other to be refunded the premium, which has been tendered to him, under proviso (e) which is as follows:

"(e) Insurance on any person under ticket policies is limited to the principal sum of $2,500.00 indemnity for injuries resulting in death, and to males, $1,250.00 for dismemberment, $12.50 weekly indemnity for wholly disabling injuries and the extra insurance provided for in clause (d); the company will return on demand to the insured or to his or her executors, administrators or assigns, all premiums paid for ticket policies in excess thereof."

In view of the fact that each policy provides for $2,500 for death, $1,250 for dismemberment, and $12.50 weekly indemnity, the words "ticket policies" must refer to other policies of the same company, for each separate policy is already so limited, and if this were doubtful the last sentence, by which the company agrees to return all premiums paid for ticket policies in excess thereof makes clear the purpose of the company to limit its liability to the face of the single policy. It is claimed, however, that the defendant is estopped to deny its full liability on the second policy because it is alleged to be the custom of the defendant to issue as many separate policies as may be requested, charging full premium for each. In proof of this alleged custom one witness testified that on December 12, 1917, he purchased four ticket policies from the defendant's agents, two at Seventh and Broadway, and the others at the main office at Thirteenth and Broadway. The policies were admitted in evidence, and it appears therefrom that two were dated 4 p. m., December 11, 1917, one 6:30 p. m., December 12, 1917, and another December 13, 1917. This evidence is far short of proving a uniform custom of the company or of its agents in June, 1916, at the time of the issuance of plaintiff's policies, or at any time, and was not competent evidence to show the custom in 1916, nor could defendant be estopped by such a custom, even if proved, unless the conduct of the plaintiff was in some manner influenced thereby, and no evidence was offered that he even knew of such custom. Plaintiff bought these two policies, each good for one day, at an interval of 24 hours, and by reason of the fact that the policies were good for more than 24 hours they overlapped for a period of 5½ hours. During that period he was injured. The policies make provision for such a contingency by providing for a refund of the premium on demand, a method of adjustment no doubt made necessary by reason of the fact that these tickets were issued to all applicants at every ticket office of the railroad company, and that a purchaser could for that reason secure a number of policies covering substantially the same period and loss. The plaintiff was entitled to recover

$1,300 upon but one policy, and upon the other 25 cents.

The trial court is directed to modify the judgment by striking out the amount of $2,600, and inserting in lieu thereof the amount of $1,300.25, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed.

SUMNER v. MOHN. (Civ. 2830.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife ⇐23¼—Evidence held insufficient to justify finding wife authorized by husband to employ attorney.

Wife's testimony held insufficient to justify finding that she was authorized to act for defendant husband in employing plaintiff attorney as her attorney at the expense of her husband in matters adverse to him and to institute an action against him.

2. Husband and wife ⇐19(18)—Legal services not "articles necessary for wife's support," to render husband liable; "necessaries."

Legal services cannot be deemed "articles necessary for a wife's support," to render her husband liable therefor, under Civ. Code, § 174; "necessaries" at common law consisting only of necessary food, drink, clothing, washing, physic, instruction, and a convenient place of residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Necessaries.]

3. Husband and wife ⇐19(18)—Code gives wife remedy for means to prosecute action for separate maintenance.

Civ. Code, § 137, providing that the court may require the husband to pay money necessary for prosecution of the wife's action for separate maintenance, guarantees the wife the means necessary for securing her rights, so that, in the absence of necessity for pledging the husband's credit for legal services, no implied power to do so exists.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Charles E. Sumner against George F. Mohn. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Adam Thompson, Iverson L. Harris, and Patterson Sprigg, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sued for the reasonable value of legal services alleged to have been performed for defendant at his special instance and request. The case was tried by a jury, which gave a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,100. Judgment followed accordingly, from which defendant appeals, presenting in lieu of a bill of exceptions a typewritten record, as provided in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and in their briefs the parties have printed portions of the record upon which they rely in support of their respective contentions.

Though nothing appears in the complaint or bill of particulars rendered by plaintiff on demand of defendant to indicate such fact, it nevertheless appears from the evidence received that plaintiff's claim for compensation is based upon services not in fact rendered to or performed for defendant, but for the latter's wife, who, as claimed by plaintiff, was agent of the husband, and being thereunto, at the expense of defendant, expressly authorized so to do, employed plaintiff as her attorney, from whom she sought advice as to marital differences existing between herself and husband, as a result of which, after some 80 or 90 separate consultations, covering a period of 3 or 4 months, plaintiff for the wife brought an action against defendant for separate maintenance.

[1] The existing agency and the fact that the wife of defendant was by him expressly authorized to employ plaintiff as an attorney, and thus obligate him to pay for the services rendered his wife, depends solely and alone upon the latter's testimony, who, notwithstanding the provisions of section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, was permitted to testify against her husband without objection interposed by defendant, who now for the first time claims that it was error. Without considering the point, we may say that her testimony is insufficient to justify the finding implied by the verdict that she was authorized to act for defendant in employing plaintiff as her attorney at the expense of her husband in matters adverse to him and for the purpose of instituting an action against him. Her testimony, after stating at great length the existing marital differences and causes thereof, is that on the evening of October 11, 1917:

"Dr. Mohn [the defendant] said to me, 'Well we had better settle up and separate.' He said, 'You go ahead and get your counsel and I will get mine.'"

And again:

"On the afternoon of October 15th, Dr. Mohn told me to go ahead and get an attorney, and we would settle this thing up."

This testimony, and this alone, not, however, communicated to the plaintiff, constitutes the only evidence in support of plain-tiff's claim that, in employing him as an attorney against defendant, his client acted merely as agent of the defendant, who was obligated to pay for the services so adversely rendered. Conceding the statements, the making of which defendant denies, were in fact made, they could not under the circumstances have been reasonably understood by Mrs. Mohn or intended by defendant to have been made with the intent and purpose of conferring authority upon the wife as agent of her husband to obligate him upon the alleged contract. Suppose, in a dispute over a boundary line between A. and B., the former should say to the latter, "You go ahead and get your attorney, and I will get mine, and we will settle this matter," manifestly B.'s attorney could not recover from A. for services rendered B. upon the theory, based upon the language used, that in employing him B. was acting as the agent of A., having authority to engage counsel for himself at A.'s expense. This being true, it follows that since, as to existing differences between the husband and wife, their relation was that of strangers, what was said by Dr. Mohn cannot be construed as creating an agency in the wife, with power to make a contract in his name, and binding him to pay for services rendered to her alone and against the husband as principal.

Conceding the evidence insufficient to show express authority conferred upon defendant's wife to make the alleged contract, plaintiff nevertheless insists that the services rendered must be deemed necessities furnished her, and hence, under the provisions of section 174, Civil Code, the husband is, regardless of the question of express agency, liable for the value thereof. The section provides that, in case the husband—

"neglect to make adequate provision for the support of his wife, * * * any other person may, in good faith, supply her with articles necessary for her support, and recover the reasonable value thereof from the husband."

The services rendered, according to respondent—

"were for investigation, consultation, preparation, and the beginning of a suit for separate maintenance, and covered a period extending from October 12, 1917, to April 3, 1918."

[2] While cases may be found tending to support respondent's contention, the overwhelming weight of authority is to the contrary. The statutory liability of the husband is for articles necessary for the wife's support. In our opinion, legal services cannot be deemed such articles. The common law defines necessities to consist only of necessary food, drink, clothing, washing, physic, instruction, and a convenient place of residence. 2 Kent's Commentaries, 124; Shelton v. Pendleton, 18 Conn. 417; Coffin v. Dunham, 8 Cush. (Mass.) 404, 54 Am. Dec. 769;

Clarke v. Burke, 65 Wis. 359, 27 N. W. 22, 56 Am. Rep. 631, and cases referred to in note in L. R. A. 1915C, p. 467.

[3] Moreover, the services rendered pertained to the bringing of a suit for separate maintenance, and the statute (section 137, Civ. Code) provides that the court may require the husband to pay such money as may be necessary for the prosecution of the action. This statute guarantees the wife full and complete relief, and provides the means necessary for securing her rights, and hence, in the absence of necessity for pledging the husband's credit, no implied power to do so exists. Meaher v. Mitchell, 112 Me. 416, 92 Atl. 492, L. R. A. 1915C, 467, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 688. In the action for separate maintenance the court had before it the parties, their property, their merits and delinquencies, and was thus, as intended by the statute, not only in a position to fix the compensation of plaintiff for the services rendered to the wife, but presumably did require the husband to pay such sum as it deemed just and equitable therefor. In view of the Code provisions of this state, a wife has no implied power to make a contract for legal services to be rendered for her sole benefit in matters adverse to the husband. Hence it follows that the attorney rendering such service at her request cannot recover therefor in an independent action against the husband. To so hold would not only jeopardize the marital or separate estate of the husband, thus violating a sound public policy, but ignore the great weight of opinion elsewhere expressed upon the subject.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Homestead §57(1)—Claimant has burden of proof.

In action to quiet title, a defendant, claiming homestead rights in property, has burden of showing, not only the declaration of the homestead and the recording of the declaration, but also that she was a resident on the property at time declaration was made and recorded.

2. Homestead §57(3)—Facts held to show residence on property by person making and recording homestead declaration.

In action to quiet title, facts held to show that defendant, claiming homestead rights in the property, was a resident on the property at the time the declaration was made and recorded.

3. Homestead §47 — Wife's declaration of homestead held sufficient, irrespective of her motive or absence of husband.

The making and filing of homestead declaration by wife, which fully complied with Civ. Code, § 1263, placed the property beyond the reach of husband's creditors, or sale on execution for his debts, etc., as effectively as though husband had filed same himself, though her purpose in so doing was to harass and annoy husband, and to cloud the title to the property, and though husband was not living on the property at the time of such declaration; wife's motive in making such declaration being immaterial, and husband's residence on the property being unnecessary, in view of subdivision 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by John Michels against John F. Burkhard and Emma A. Burkhard. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Knott, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Samuel D. Weil, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to quiet title. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer of the defendant Emma A. Burkhard is a general denial of the material allegations of the complaint. By way of further defense she sets up an alleged declaration of homestead, made, executed and recorded by her in the year 1912, covering the property involved in this action, which declaration contains recitations that she is actually residing on such property with her family, a son, and that her husband has never made a declaration of homestead on said property, or "executed any document claiming a homestead" therein, alleging that there has been no abandonment or conveyance of the same, that it is in full force and effect, and that all the property described in said declaration of homestead is community property, having been acquired by defendants after their marriage otherwise than by gift, devise, or descent.

As a "third defense," defendant Emma A. Burkhard alleges that on January 6, 1914, a certain action was pending in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in which she was plaintiff and John F. Burkhard, her co-defendant here, was defendant; that said action was an action for her own support and maintenance; that on said last-mentioned date said cause was tried; that the court gave judgment therein, decreeing that said defendant pay to said plaintiff the sum of $35 per month, and decreeing said judgment a first lien on the land referred to in the present proceeding as well as other real property not in controversy here; that said judgment was, on the 16th day of June, 1914, duly recorded, etc.; and that the same has never been reversed, modified, or appealed from. Defendant John F. Burkhard did not answer.

The court found for the plaintiff, after trial of the issues so presented, holding plaintiff to be the owner of the land described in his complaint, "subject only to the lien of a certain decree"—the decree granting support, etc., above referred to. The findings further declare:

"That claim of defendants, and each and either of them, of any estate or interest in or to any" of said land, "except by virtue of said lien," is without any right whatever; that defendants are now, and at all times mentioned in the complaint were, husband and wife; that defendant Emma A. Burkhard executed said declaration of homestead; and "that all the facts stated in said declaration are true, except as follows: It is not true that the said defendant Emma A. Burkhard, at the time she executed or acknowledged the said declaration of homestead, or at any time since, made the said declaration with the intention that it was or should be for the joint benefit of herself and her husband, John F. Burkhard, but she made the said declaration for her sole benefit, and for the purpose of harassing and annoying her said husband, and to cloud the title of the real property therein sought to be claimed as a homestead."

Judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant Emma A. Burkhard appeals from that portion of the judgment adverse to her.

[1, 2] The only point before us is the validity of the alleged homestead. It is urged by appellant that the finding of the lower court that "it is not true that said defendant Emma A. Burkhard, at the time she executed or acknowledged the said declaration of homestead, or at any time since, made the declaration with the intention that it was or should be for the joint benefit of herself and her said husband, John F. Burkhard, but she made the said declaration for her sole benefit, and to cloud the title to the real property therein sought to be claimed as a homestead," is not supported by any evidence and is against the law. Many cases are cited by appellant, presumably in support of this contention. All, however, go to the question of disclosing the object and purpose of the homestead laws, and give reasons why the description of the property in controversy in the various cases was sufficient—neither of which propositions is at issue here. We therefore consider none of the cases cited in point.

"The burden of showing not only the declaration of the homestead and the recording of the declaration, but also of showing that she was a resident upon the property at the time the declaration was made and recorded, rested upon the plaintiff." Machado v. Machado, 36 Cal. App. 646, 172 Pac. 1124.

We think this requirement was fully met in this case. It is stipulated that ever since November 6, 1901, up to and including November 30, 1912, the record and legal title to this property was in the said defendant husband, and that the latter had not at any time declared or selected the same as a homestead. The record shows that the defendant Emma A. Burkhard brought an action against her husband, John F. Burkhard, in August, 1912, and secured from the court an order excluding him from the premises occupied by them jointly as their home, and that he, the said husband, had complied with said order, having promptly left the premises in question. This order was in full force and effect in November, 1912, the date when the alleged declaration of homestead was executed and recorded by the defendant Emma A. Burkhard. The divorce case was tried in January, 1914, and by the trial court in that action the defendant Emma A. Burkhard, plaintiff there, was ordered from the premises in controversy here to other property, known as the "Elm property," and immediately thereafter she complied with such order, since when she nor her son, or either of them, has resided on said premises. On March 21, 1917, the defendant John F. Burkhard made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff here a deed to the property in question, which instrument was recorded the next day.

[3] As we have already seen, the court found:

"That all the facts stated in said declaration are true, except as follows: It is not true that said defendant Emma A. Burkhard, at the time she executed or acknowledged the said declaration of homestead, or at any time since made the said declaration with the intention that it was or should be for the joint benefit of herself and her said husband, John F. Burkhard, but she made the said declaration for her sole benefit, and for the purpose of harassing and annoying her said husband, and to cloud the title to the real property therein sought to be claimed as a homestead." (Italics ours.)

We think this finding in effect says:

"The declaration of homestead as made and recorded complied in every way with the statutory requirement, but the motive prompting the making of the same is questioned."

In our opinion it is immaterial what the motive of the wife may have been, as it is not legally incumbent upon her to give any reason for her action. All she needs to do is to comply with the statute. Farley v. Hopkins, 79 Cal. 203, 21 Pac. 737. This she unquestionably did. Even although we assume that the wife's motive was entirely bad, as found by the court, the fact still remains that, as a matter of law, when the said declaration of homestead was so made and recorded, it actually placed the property described therein beyond the reach of creditors of her husband, or sale upon execution for his debts, etc., as effectively as though he had filed the same himself. To this extent, therefore, the declaration was made for their joint benefit. We think this legal implication, even standing alone, sufficient to support the statement that the declaration was made for their joint benefit. To hold otherwise would be tantamount to denying the very right vouchsafed the wife under the specific terms of the statute. Subdivision 2 of the section covering this phase of the matter, too, would seem to preclude the idea that residence on the property in question by both spouses is necessary. At any rate, it is conceded that the declaration here involved complies with section 1263 of the Civil Code in every particular.

For this reason we hold that the court erred in concluding from the legal facts found that the declaration in question was "null and void and of no effect," and that such error was prejudicial to the rights of this appealing defendant.

Judgment reversed.

PRATT v. HARROLD. (Civ. 3188.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 20, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife §333(4)—Defendant's letters to wife intercepted by husband admissible to rebut the claim that wife tempted defendant.

In an action for alienation of wife's affections, where defendant claimed that he was the victim of a conspiracy, and that the woman tempted him, letters written by him to plaintiff's wife, which were intercepted by plaintiff so that they could not have alienated the affections of the wife, were nevertheless admissible to corroborate the wife's testimony that defendant had made love to her and encouraged her to obtain divorce from her husband and marry defendant.

2. Witnesses §53(1)—Wife's testimony in husband's behalf admissible to show alienation of affection.

If Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, disqualified the wife as a witness for her husband in an action for alienation of her affections, that disqualification was removed by the amendment of 1907, which permits such testimony in an action brought by husband or wife against another person for alienation of the affections.

Action by Arthur H. Pratt against Alvin H. Harrold. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., and S. M. Johnstone, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for $1,500 for the alienation of the affections of plaintiff's wife.

The only points raised on the appeal are upon the rulings of the court in the admission of evidence. Exception is taken to the introduction of certain letters written by the defendant to plaintiff's wife, a number of which were intercepted by the husband before their delivery through the mails to the wife, and also to the admission in evidence of the wife's testimony. Appellant's brief is very meager in elucidating his points, and there is no brief for respondent.

[1] We think the letters were relevant and competent evidence. They, it is true, not having reached the wife, could not have been influential in diverting her affections from her husband, although they were fervently directed to that end. However, the defendant, for defense to the action, had pleaded and attempted to prove that he was the victim of a conspiracy, and that the woman had tempted him. These letters were calculated to show, by their ardent declarations and admissions, that he was and for some time past had been by no means a passive agent in the love-making, and tended to corroborate the wife's testimony that defendant had made love to her, gained her affections, and encouraged her in a plan to obtain a divorce from her husband and marry him.

[2] The objection that the wife was not a competent witness, under the prohibitions of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure disqualifying a wife as a witness under certain conditions, is not well taken. If this section has ever applied to testimony such as here offered, the limitation has been removed ever since the amendment of 1907, which permits such testimony in an action brought by husband or wife against another person for alienation of the affections of either the husband or the wife.

The wife's testimony was rather perfunctory, and not very conclusive; but appellant concedes that it was, with other evidence in the case, sufficient, if admissible, to sustain the findings and judgment, and in this we agree with him.

Judgment affirmed.

SCHILLING v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA
et al. (Civ. 3385.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 21, 1920. Rehearing Denied May 13, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §420—Compensation act authorizes commission to fix fees of claimant's attorneys.

The Industrial Accident Commission has authority, under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, §§ 24(b) (1), and 24(d), to fix the fees of attorneys representing a claimant.

2. Master and servant §420—Compensation act merely authorizes determination of reasonableness of attorney's fee.

In fixing the fee of claimant's attorney under Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, §§ 24(b) (1) and 24(d), the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission is confined to determination of the reasonableness of the fee for the services in the proceedings before it, and does not extend to the determination of the legality of a contract for the payment for services in independent proceedings, though the contract is made payable out of the award of compensation made by the commission.

3. Master and servant §420—Compensation commission bound to give attorney fair hearing on question of reasonableness of fee.

If a claimant under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, who has entered into a contract employing an attorney and agreeing to pay him compensation for the services to be rendered, seeks to avoid the obligation of the contract after the services have been rendered and the profits retained by him, the attorney is entitled to a fair hearing before the commission on the question of the reasonableness of the fee agreed to be paid.

Proceeding by John B. Costello under the Workmen's Compensation Act to obtain compensation for personal injuries. Application by Frank Schilling for certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission fixing his compensation for legal services. Order annulled.

Frank Schilling, of San Francisco, pro se.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner instituted this proceeding in certiorari to review the order of the Industrial Accident Commission fixing his compensation, after rehearing, for legal services rendered to an applicant for compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

It appears from the record that the applicant, having been injured while in the course of his employment, consulted petitioner, who is an attorney at law, and through his advice and counsel procured temporary compensation from the insurance carrier; that thereafter he obtained other employment, during the course of which he was again injured and again consulted petitioner; and that thereafter, as the result of further consultation with petitioner, he was advised that he might apply for permanent compensation as the result of the first injury upon medical testimony which it was deemed possible to procure at that time. This application was made through the advice and assistance of petitioner, and a partial hearing was had thereon before the commission, wherein the evidence was very unfavorable to the applicant; but thereafter, through the advice and activities of petitioner a settlement was made with the insurance carrier for $650, which was approved by the commission and subsequently paid. It further appears that at the time of the approval of this settlement the commission fixed the compensation for petitioner's legal services at $45 without a hearing; that at the request of petitioner a rehearing was granted by the commission for the purpose of determining the reasonableness of the order fixing such fee. Petitioner claimed that he had an oral contract with the applicant for the payment of one-third of the amount recovered from the insurance carrier, which amount included payment for legal services rendered by him to the applicant in matters not directly connected with the proceeding in which the recovery was had. He insisted that this contract should not be declared void in toto, and that in any event the allowance of $45 was wholly unreasonable in payment for the legal services which he had rendered in the proceeding before the commission.

As disclosed by the record filed by respondent herein, the attitude of the referee to whom the rehearing had been referred by the commission was extremely hostile and prejudicial to petitioner throughout the entire proceedings. Immaterial and irrelevant testimony was taken for the purpose of attacking the professional standing of petitioner; the referee took petitioner's witnesses out of his hands, conducted their examination in his own way, refused to permit petitioner to cross-examine witnesses who were antagonistic to him, and studiously obstructed petitioner in his attempts to produce testimony favorable to his cause.

[1, 2] Counsel for respondent states that there is but one question involved in this proceeding, "What was the value of the services performed by petitioner, * * *" or "Has the Industrial Accident Commission authority under sections 24(b) (1) and 24(d) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, to fix the fees of attorneys representing applicants before it?" This court is unable to determine the value of the services performed by the petitioner because the referee to whom that matter was referred for adjudication failed to give petitioner a fair opportunity to make proof of such value. That the Industrial Accident Commission has authority under the sections cited to fix fees can scarcely be questioned. Section 24, subdivision (b) (1), authorizes the commission to fix and determine a reasonable attorney's fee for legal services pertaining to any claim for compensation or application filed therefor. No constitutional objection has been raised to this provision of the act, and it may therefore, in this proceeding, be taken for granted that the power is one which the commission may lawfully exercise. Subdivision (d) of the same section provides that "no claim or agreement for the legal services or disbursements * * * in excess of a reasonable amount, shall be valid or binding in any respect, and it shall be competent for the commission to determine what constitutes such reasonable amount." No constitutional objection has been raised to this provision of the act, and for the purpose of this proceeding it also may be assumed to be valid. But it must be evident that if the obligation of a contract to pay for legal services, which has been executed by parties legally competent to contract, is to be impaired by the order of the commission solely on the ground that it is unreasonable, some semblance of a judicial hearing must be accorded the contracting parties before such order is made. Furthermore, the jurisdiction of the commission is confined to the determination of the reasonableness of the fee to be paid to counsel for the legal services rendered to the applicant in connection with the proceedings before it, and does not extend to the determination of the legality of a contract for the payment for legal services rendered in independent proceedings, even though such contract is made payable out of the award of compensation made to the applicant by the commission.

[3] An applicant for compensation is entitled to be represented by counsel in proceedings before the commission. There is no odium attached to counsel who render such services. Though the efforts of the commission to protect the interests of applicants for compensation are highly commendable, it is just as important that other persons coming within its jurisdiction be treated with equal justice. If a party who has entered into a contract employing an attorney and agreeing to pay him compensation for the services to be rendered seeks to avoid the obligation of such contract after the services have been rendered and the benefits retained by him, the attorney is entitled to a fair and impartial hearing before the commission on the question of the reasonableness of the fee which the contracting parties had agreed should be paid.

That petitioner in this case did not receive such a hearing is too plain to question. The award of $45 as compensation to petitioner for the services admitted to have been rendered by him in the proceedings before the commission is less than the ordinary charge made by attorneys for the collection of a promissory note without any form of legal proceedings. Upon the meager showing petitioner was permitted to make it is apparent that the fee allowed was unreasonably low for the services rendered. But, as heretofore stated, it is impossible for this court to determine what allowance should be made for the services rendered, because the referee failed to permit petitioner to fairly present his evidence on that issue.

For these reasons the order of the commission is annulled.

DREW v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2126.)

1. Execution $\S$ 388 — Order of examination misnaming party to action held sufficient notice.

An order of examination after judgment entitled "Paul Lobree, Plaintiff," instead of "Phil" Lobree, held sufficient notice to the party sought to be examined; the error being merely clerical, and the papers served clearly identifying the action.

2. Pleading $\S$ 129(2)—Failure to deny in answer an admission of truth.

Where complaint alleged that defendant was a corporation duly organized and existing, such allegation was admitted by an answer of the corporation which failed to deny the same.

3. Contempt $\S$ 21—Judgment against corporation not open to attack in a proceeding against officer for contempt.

Where an allegation in the complaint that defendant was a duly organized and existing corporation was not denied in the answer, a judgment entered against the corporation was conclusive as to the corporate existence of the defendant and not open to attack in a proceeding in contempt against an officer thereof.

Petition by F. C. Drew for a writ of review to have an order of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Mendocino, Hon. J. Q. White, Judge, adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, annulled and set aside. Writ of review dismissed.

See, also, 185 Pac. 680.

W. H. Metson and R. G. Hudson, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondents.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is a petition for a writ of review, by which the petitioner seeks to have an order of the superior court of Mendocino county, adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, annulled and set aside.

The material facts of the matter may be briefly stated as follows: On the 28th day of October, 1918, in an action then pending in the said superior court of Mendocino county, entitled "Phil Lobree, Plaintiff, v. L. E. White Lumber Company, a Corporation, and Goodyear Redwood Company, a Corporation, Defendants," judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for the sum of $7,150, with interest and costs. On the 4th day of August, 1919, Robert Duncan, the attorney for the plaintiff in said action, filed and presented to the judge of said court his affidavit wherein he set forth the rendition of the said judgment; the issuance on November 30, 1918, of an execution against the property of the said judgment debtor, L. E. White Lumber Company, and that the execution was afterwards returned wholly unsatisfied; that the said L. E. White Lumber Company had its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco; that said F. C. Drew was at the time of the commencement of said action and at all times since has been the president and general manager of the said L. E. White Lumber Company, and that he resides in and has his office in the said city and county of San Francisco; that the said company owned property and had it in its possession or under its control, not exempt from execution, which it unjustly refuses to apply to the satisfaction of said judgment, and that said Drew, as president and general manager, had property of said company in his possession and under his control, which he unjustly refuses to apply to the satisfaction of said judgment; that the said company had books of account, which were in the possession and under the control of the said Drew, as president and manager thereof, showing the properties belonging to the said company, and also showing the receipts and disbursements of said corporation, and particularly showing the receipts of moneys from the sale of its properties to the Goodyear Redwood Company and the amounts and disbursements thereof; that the said L. E. White Lumber Company claimed to have received from said Goodyear Redwood Company a large amount in cash within two or three years before the making of said affidavit; that the said company and its said president, F. C. Drew, claimed that the said company was solvent and able to pay all its debts, including the said judgment. The said affidavit prayed for the appointment of a referee in the city and county of San Francisco, and that an order be made requiring said judgment debtor L. E. White Lumber Company, by its president and general manager, F. C. Drew, and by its other officers and directors, to appear before the said referee, and to answer concerning the property of said company, and to produce before the referee its books showing the property and moneys belonging to the said corporation.

Upon the presentation of this affidavit the court on the 4th day of August, 1919, made its order appointing one Casper A. Ornbaum referee, and ordered the said judgment debtor L. E. White Lumber Company, by its president and general manager, F. C. Drew, and said F. C. Drew, to appear before the said referee on the 14th day of August, 1919, at 2 o'clock p. m., and submit to examination and make discovery under oath concerning the property of the said company, and to bring before the referee the books of account of the said company. This order of the court, together with the said affidavit of Robert Duncan, was duly served on F. C. Drew on the 9th day of August, 1919, and he failed to appear for examination and no appearance was made for or on behalf of the said L. E. White Lumber Company. The petitioner, F. C. Drew, was thereafter adjudged guilty of contempt of court for failing to obey said order.

The petitioner claims that the superior court of Mendocino county was without jurisdiction to render its judgment in contempt against him, because: (1) The order made by the court for him to appear and submit to an examination was entitled in an action not pending in said superior court, in this, that the said order was entitled "Paul" Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Company, a Corporation, et al.; (2) because the judgment sought to be enforced in the supplement proceedings, in which petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt, was null and void by reason of the fact that said judgment was made and entered in an action brought against L. E. White Lumber Company, which action was instituted after the said company had forfeited its charter by reason of its failure to pay its annual franchise tax, which forfeiture occurred on March 3, 1917.

[1] 1. The affidavit of Robert Duncan above referred to, and upon which the said order to appear for examination was based, was properly and correctly entitled, as follows, to wit: "Phil Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Company et al." This affidavit gave the correct date of the judgment and the amount thereof, and also the date when the judgment was entered and docketed. It recited also the date of the issuance of the execution and the fact that the execution was returned wholly unsatisfied. The order of examination made on this affidavit, as before stated, was entitled "Paul Lobree, Plaintiff," instead of "Phil Lobree, Plaintiff." This error in the title of the cause did not, in our opinion, render the order void, and no one could be misled by reason thereof.

It is perfectly clear from the statements contained in said order that it was an order for examination made in the case of Phil Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Co., a Corporation, et al.; that such is the fact is plain from the following statements contained in the order: It refers to the said affidavit, giving the name of the affiant and stating that he was the attorney for the plaintiff, and further stated that it appeared by the said affidavit "and by the records on file in said action that judgment was recovered therein against the defendant L. E. White Lumber Company, a corporation, on the 28th day of October, A. D. 1918, for the sum of $7,150, with interest and costs; that said judgment was duly entered and docketed in the office of the clerk of this court on said date; that an execution against the property of said judgment debtor was on the 30th day of November, A. D. 1918, duly issued to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the county where said judgment debtor and its president and general manager, F. C. Drew, had their and each of their principal places of business at the time of the issuance of said execution and ever since have had and still have"; and also states that said execution was returned wholly unsatisfied.

It likewise appears from the affidavit of the petitioner filed in the superior court of Mendocino county, in answer to the order to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, that there was served upon him on the 9th day of August, 1919, a certified copy of said affidavit of Robert Duncan, and also of said order, and "that to said affidavit there was attached a certificate of Hale Prather, county clerk and ex officio clerk of the superior court of the county of Mendocino, certifying that he had compared the foregoing copy of an order and affidavit in the case of Phil Lobree, plaintiff, v. L. E. White Lumber Company, a corporation, et al., defendants, with the original records, as the same remained in his office, and that the same were correct transcripts thereof and of the whole of said original documents."

There can be no question from the foregoing statements contained in the order that it was made in the case of Phil Lobree v. L. E. White Lumber Company et al., and that the error in the title of the cause is wholly immaterial, as all the information concerning the action and judgment was fully and accurately given in the order and in the affidavit of Robert Duncan, certified copies of which were served on petitioner on the 9th day of August, 1919. The error was merely a clerical error, and no one could be deceived or misled thereby. It was held in Ex parte Gordan, 95 Cal. 374, 30 Pac. 561, that an order that the husband pay a monthly allowance for the support of a minor child designated as "Lina" or "Lena" Gordan was not void as being an order for the support of a different person from "Leah" Gordan, though the names are not the same, nor are they idem sonans, when it appears that the child is referred to throughout the proceedings as the sole issue of the parties to the action, and is thereby identified.

[2, 3] 2. The claim of the petitioner that the judgment is void because the action in which it was rendered was instituted after the defendant L. E. White Lumber Company had forfeited its charter, by reason of its failure to pay its franchise tax for the year 1916, cannot be sustained. It appears from the record that the action was commenced on the 25th day of June, 1917. The complaint was verified and alleged:

"That said defendant L. E. White Lumber Company is now, and was at all the times in this complaint mentioned, a corporation, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California."

This allegation of the complaint was admitted by the answer of said corporation in failing to deny the same, and the court found that the said allegation of the complaint was true. The corporate existence of said company being thus established by the said admission of the pleadings, the judgment entered thereon is final and conclusive upon said matter and is not open to attack in this proceeding.

In the case of Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 Pac. 454, there was a special defense in which it was alleged that the plaintiff was a corporation, organized, existing, and doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California; that at all times from its incorporation it has wholly failed to comply with the provisions of the act imposing a license tax upon corporations and had wholly failed to pay its license tax. No evidence was introduced in support of this plea, and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff. The court said that—

"The answer itself avers that the plaintiff is a corporation and is engaged in business as a corporation. This is an admission of the plaintiff's corporate capacity to sue. * * * The corporate existence and general capacity of the plaintiff thus being established by the admission of the pleadings it was a matter of affirmative defense for the box company to have shown the extraneous fact that plaintiff had failed to comply with the corporation license tax law. * * *"

And the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was sustained.

It follows that the petitioner was in contempt of court in failing to obey the order of August 4, 1919, directing him to appear before the referee for examination, and the court was in the exercise of its jurisdiction in holding him guilty of contempt.

It is therefore ordered that the writ of review be, and the same is hereby, dismissed.

WRIGHT v. BALDWIN. (Civ. 3351.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 19, 1920.)

1. Libel and slander ☞ 120(2)—Malice essential to recovery of punitive damages.

Since punitive damages in an action for slander are allowable under Civ. Code, § 3294, as punishment for the motive of the act, they can only be allowed where there was malice, and an instruction authorizing punitive damages if the jury found defendants spoke words slanderous per se without requiring a finding of malice was erroneous.

2. Libel and slander ☞ 112(2)—Malice may be proved indirectly.

Malice in the utterance of a slander which authorizes punitive damages may be proved either by direct evidence of the evil motive or intent or by inferences which may be drawn from the facts proved.

3. Libel and slander ☞ 123(6)—Inference of malice from unprivileged slander is for the jury.

Though malice may be inferred from an unprivileged utterance of a false charge slanderous per se, such inference must be drawn by the jury from the facts proved; it is not a presumption of law which the court itself can make.

4. Malicious prosecution ☞ 21(1)—Full disclosure to attorney on whose advice prosecutor acted in defense.

Where defendant in an action for malicious prosecution alleged full disclosure to and reliance upon advice by his attorney, the district attorney, and the deputy district attorney, he is entitled to a verdict if he made a full disclosure to any one of the attorneys upon whose advice he relied, and an instruction requiring a finding of full disclosure to each one of them is erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by F. E. Wright against James V. Baldwin for malicious prosecution and slander. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Sacramento, and Bert Campbell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John H. Miller, of San Francisco, and Edward C. Higgins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment, following a verdict, entered against him in favor of plaintiff in a joint action for malicious prosecution and slander. The complaint contained four causes of action, three for malicious prosecution growing out of the arrest and trial of the plaintiff upon a charge of embezzlement, and the fourth for slander growing out of statements alleged to have been made by the defendant in the courtroom of a justice of the peace who was conducting the preliminary hearing of the plaintiff upon the embezzlement complaint. Plaintiff was nonsuited on the second and third causes. The jury awarded him damages in the sum of $6,000, with nothing in the verdict to indicate what portion was allowed on each cause of action or what portion was allowed for either compensatory or punitive damages.

Various grounds for reversal have been urged by appellant; the most patent objections going to the error of the trial court in instructing the jury. Upon the cause of action for slander the court, after instructing the jury that the words charged as having been used were slanderous per se, and that the first duty of the jury was to determine whether those words were used by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, gave the following instruction as to the damages which might be awarded under this cause of action:

"If you believe from a greater weight of the evidence that they were so used, your verdict will be for the plaintiff, and you will assess such a reasonable sum as his damages as in your sound discretion you believe from the facts and circumstances in evidence will be just and right, and * * * will compensate the plaintiff for the injury to his feelings, etc. * * * You may also allow such a temperate amount by way of punitive or exemplary damages as will serve to prevent or deter said defendant from committing a similar wrong hereafter. If you believe from the evidence that defendant did not utter the words charged in the complaint of and concerning plaintiff, you will, of course, award no damages therefor."

[1-3] The foregoing were the only instructions given by the court upon the cause of action for slander. All the other instructions related solely to the first cause of action for malicious prosecution. That these instructions failed to present the issues fairly to the jury cannot be doubted. The effect was that, if the jury found that the defendant spoke the objectionable words of and concerning the plaintiff, they could award the plaintiff both compensatory and punitive damages without regard to any consideration of malice or motive, but that they could decline to award damages for the alleged slander only in the event they should find that defendant did not utter the words charged of and concerning plaintiff. Punitive damages being recoverable under section 3294, Civil Code, as punishment for the motive of the act complained of after compensation for the injuries suffered by the act has been made, malice is essential to recovery. Such malice may be proved directly or indirectly by direct evidence of the evil motive or intent or by inferences which may be drawn from the facts proved. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 163, 116 Pac. 530. Malice, therefore, is always an issue in an action for slander where plaintiff seeks punitive damages. And though, in awarding punitive damages, the jury may infer malice from an unprivileged utterance of a false charge slanderous per se, such inference must be drawn by the jury from the facts proved; it is not a presumption of law which the court itself can make. The failure to so instruct the jury was error.

[4] Criticism is also made of the instruction given at the request of the plaintiff relating to the special defense interposed by the defendant to the first cause of action that the prosecution was not instituted by him until after he had made a full and fair disclosure of all the facts relating thereto to counsel and had been advised by counsel that in his opinion plaintiff was guilty of the crime of embezzlement. The undisputed facts were that, prior to the institution of the criminal proceeding complained of, defendant consulted his own counsel and was by him advised that in his opinion the plaintiff was guilty of embezzlement, and that the defendant and his counsel then presented the facts in their possession to the district attorney of Los Angeles county, who gave defendant the same advice, but suggested that he also present the facts to one of his deputies in order that a thorough investigation might be made before a warrant should issue for plaintiff's arrest. This was also done, and the deputy district attorney gave defendant the same opinion as to plaintiff's guilt.

The instruction complained of was that the jury should disregard said defense "if you believe from the evidence that the said defendant did not state to his attorney or to the district or deputy district attorney, or any or either of them, all the facts within his knowledge," etc.

The vice of this instruction is that it required the jury to find that defendant had made a full and fair disclosure of all the facts within his knowledge respecting the transactions complained of to each one of the three attorneys consulted by him, whereas proof of a full and fair disclosure of such facts to any one of the three would have been sufficient to sustain this defense if defendant had acted upon the advice of the attorney to whom such disclosure was made.

Other errors complained of do not require discussion, as it is unlikely that they will occur upon a new trial.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

COREY v. MATOT et al. (Civ. 2563.)

(District Court of Appeal. Second District, Division 2. California. April 20, 1920.)

Homestead §117—Mortgage before declaration of homestead cannot afterwards be extended by husband alone.

Where a wife filed a homestead declaration on property covered by a mortgage given by herself and husband, a new estate was created which was subject to the mortgage, under Civ. Code, § 1241, subd. 4, but which could not be affected without the consent of the wife by any subsequent proceedings, so that an extension of the mortgage by the husband without the wife's knowledge or consent could not affect the homestead and would not permit foreclosure after the time limitations from the maturity of the original mortgage had expired.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Manima Burton Corey against John E. Matot and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Kenneth E. Matot, of Los Angeles, Hert & Watt, and Porter, Morgan & Parrot, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. In this case the defendants John E. Matot and Mary E. Matot, husband and wife, had executed to the plaintiff their promissory note secured by mortgage upon certain real property. Thereafter, and before the maturity of the note, the defendant Mary E. Matot declared and filed a homestead on the property in conformity with section 1263 of the Civil Code, for the benefit of herself and family. After the maturity of the note, but before the running of the statute of limitations, the defendant John E. Matot, without the knowledge or consent of his wife, entered into a stipulation and agreement in writing with the payee of the note and mortgagee of the property extending the time of payment on said note and mortgage. After the statute of limitations had run on the obligation as originally evidenced by the promissory note, but prior to the date of payment as covered by the extension, this action was brought to foreclose the mortgage, in satisfaction of the liability on the note.

The court found that the defendant John E. Matot was liable under the obligation of the note as extended, and decreed the foreclosure and sale of the property to pay the amount of such indebtedness. The appeal is taken by both defendants from the judgment of foreclosure. The only question to be decided is whether the extension of the liability of the defendant John E. Matot upon the promissory note preserved the lien of the mortgage as against the homestead after the statute of limitations, which was pleaded, had run against the liability as originally created.

The contention of appellants is that the husband alone had no right to extend or prolong the period of the lien, as affecting the homestead, beyond the liability as defined by the note and mortgage at the date of filing the declaration of homestead. In support of this contention they cite and rely upon the rulings of the Supreme Court in Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 11, Wells v. Harter, 2 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 52, Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 476, 58 Pac. 910, 59 Pac. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, and Ainsworth v. Morrill, 31 Cal. App. 510, 160 Pac. 1089. Only the first of the decisions cited is closely in point. In Wells v. Harter, the facts are not very fully stated, but it appears from the opinion that the four-year period of limitation had run before the agreement for extension, by the husband alone, of the time of payment was entered into. Presumptively the bar of the statute, which was pleaded, applied. It is clear that an agreement made after the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations was the creation of a new liability, not a mere extension of the old one, and would not be effective as to a homestead without the consent of the wife. Hart v. Church, while it quotes with approval Barber v. Babel, is quite different in its facts from those set out in that case or in the case at bar, and all that the court decides is that a homestead cannot be relinquished, alienated, or incumbered without the joint and concurrent act of both husband and wife. If the question here arose upon the admitted creation of a new lien, the citation would be conclusive against it. But the ground upon which the decree of foreclosure here is sought to be upheld is that the extension of the mortgage lien was not the creation of a new lien, but a continuance of the old. Ainsworth v. Morrill only declares the same rule, that the homestead right can only be affected by the joint act of husband and wife.

We are of the opinion, however, that the decision of the Supreme Court in Barber v. Babel, supra, is controlling in appellants' favor in this case. There, as here, the premises in question had been mortgaged by husband and wife to secure their joint note. They subsequently, before maturity of the note, filed a declaration of homestead on the property. Later, before the statute of limitations had run, the husband, without the wife joining therein and without her knowledge or consent, executed a new note and mortgage for the debt, and the old mortgage was satisfied of record. Suit was brought to foreclose the new mortgage after the statute of limitations had run on the old, and it was held that the new mortgage did not create a lien on the homestead. If this were the end of the matter, respondent's contention that the decision is not in point would be beyond dispute. The new mortgage was an attempt of the husband alone to create a new lien on the homestead property. But this case goes further. The plaintiff in the foreclosure action alleged fraud on the part of Frederick Babel, the husband, in securing the release of the old mortgage by representing that there was no homestead on the property, and it was sought to have the fraudulent satisfaction of the old mortgage disregarded and set aside and to grant plaintiff relief by foreclosure under the first mortgage. That the giving of this new note under the circumstances stated was in effect an extension of the old debt as to the husband, there can be no doubt, and the court in that case so recognizes it. But it further holds that the wife was not estopped by the acts of her husband, and that he could not by such means prolong the lien on the homestead. As is said by the court in this connection:

"The giving of the new note, and extending the time of payment, were, also, the act of the husband alone, to which the wife was no party. Under the authorities cited, he could no more * * * effect the same purpose by continuing the old lien beyond the time when the action would be barred, as to the wife, than in the direct mode attempted of executing a new mortgage and discharging the old."

And again:

"Had the suit now under consideration been brought before the action on the old note and mortgage was barred, and no question under the statute of limitations had arisen, then there would have been some analogy between the cases, for it could well have been said that the execution of the second note and mortgage, and surrender of the first, and cancellation of the mortgage upon the record, had been procured by fraud, and the transaction being void on that ground, the old note and mortgage would be still alive, and unaffected by it. The satisfaction being void, there would then have been a valid, live mortgage. * * * But in this case, if we consider the new note and mortgage, and the discharge of the old mortgage void, on the ground of fraud, the old cause of action is itself barred, by the statute, and no action can be maintained upon the mortgage, unless a new right has been acquired as against the wife and the homestead estate, and this new right could not be created by the act of the husband alone in any form."

Counsel for respondent, in contesting this doctrine, cite a number of decisions from other states: Jackson v. Longwell, 63 Kan. 93, 64 Pac. 991; Billingsley v. Niblett, 56 Miss. 537; Hambrick v. Jones, 64 Miss. 240, 8 South. 176; Roberts v. Roberts, 10 N. D. 531, 88 N.W. 289. The first of these does not involve a homestead right, and all the others are cases in which the mortgage was originally executed by both husband and wife after the homestead was created. These decisions do hold that a mortgage so executed may be foreclosed against the homestead so long as the principal debt exists against the husband, although barred as to the wife. To the contrary, in a Texas case (San Antonio Real Estate, etc., Ass'n v. Stewart, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 299, 65 S. W. 665), it is held that a husband cannot waive the wife's rights or extend a lien created on the homestead by a joint mortgage by an act in which the wife does not join. In none of these cases is the state law governing the homestead set forth, and their applicability under the homestead laws of California is therefore left somewhat obscure. They in no event touch the distinction which exists in the case at bar and in Barber v. Babel, supra. The opinion in the latter case is a well-considered discussion of the nature of the homestead estate by Chief Justice Sawyer, and the doctrine there laid down does not seem to have been questioned in any subsequent California decision.

The ground of distinction between a mortgage executed by both husband and wife upon an existing homestead and one where the homestead is declared subject to a previously executed mortgage would seem to be that in the instance of a pre-existing homestead the mortgage is an express incumbrance of the homestead interest, evidenced as required under the homestead laws. The homestead is thereby dedicated to the payment of the debt, and is subject to the continued existence of the debt as to either of the parties to the mortgage; while in the case of a mortgage made prior to the homestead declaration only the title as it then stands is pledged. The subsequent declaration of a homestead creates a new and distinct species of title in the property. This newly created interest is under the statute subject to the existing mortgage, but only within the application of the strict terms of the mortgage liability. It cannot be extended or prolonged by implication or by the acts of one alone of the makers, but only in the manner provided by the statute for incumbering or alienating a homestead. The effect of grafting the new homestead right upon the title is similar to the effect of a conveyance of the mortgaged premises to one not bound by the contract of the note and mortgage. The rule is stated, in discussing this point, in Barber v. Babel, supra, as follows:

"The cases of Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; Lent v. Morrill, 25 Cal. 499; Lent v. Shear, 26 Cal. 370; Low v. Allen, 26 Cal. 141, and other cases to the same effect, establish the principle that after a conveyance of the mortgaged premises, or the transfer of any interest therein, the mortgagor has no power to create, revive, renew, or prolong a charge upon the premises or interest therein, so conveyed or transferred, while such interest remains in another party. * * * The principles established by these cases directly apply to the case under consideration. The original note and mortgage were valid, but subsequent to the making of this mortgage the defendants duly recorded their declaration of homestead, and thereby became jointly vested with new and important rights, which were inalienable, except in the mode prescribed by the statute. The wife acquired a new, distinct, personal interest, which she did not before have, and which she could not afterward be deprived of by any act of the husband."

Under subdivision 4 of section 1241, Civil Code, the homestead is made subject to "debts secured by mortgages on the premises, executed and recorded before the declaration of homestead was filed for record." The same is true of conveyances of estates subject to debts secured by mortgage; but in neither instance can the liability against the interest created by the homestead declaration or the conveyance be enlarged or extended without the consent of the parties in interest. And in the case of a homestead right, such consent can only be evidenced by writing, jointly and concurrently executed by the homestead parties. Sections 1242, 1243, Civ. Code.

We find nothing in the case of First National Bank v. Merrill, 167 Cal. 392, 139 Pac. 1066, cited by respondent, that affects our conclusion in this matter. In that case the alleged mortgage was executed in a manner to create a valid lien on the property described, which was not at the time of the execution of the instrument covered by a homestead. It was held that a subsequent homestead filing on the property was subject to this mortgage, although it had not been executed in a manner that would have created a lien had the homestead existed at the time of its execution. This view of the law is unquestioned. There is no claim, however, that the original lien in that case had expired or in any way become ineffective, and it does not involve the effect of any attempt to prolong or extend its operation.

The judgment is reversed.

COHN v. THOMPSON et al. (Civ. 2083.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 15, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 14, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨515(1)—Defect in street improvement proceedings relating to bonds relieved by curative provision.

Under the Bond Act of 1911, § 2, amending St. 1893, p. 33, § 4, a property owner who did not appeal to the board of trustees cannot complain of the action of the superintendent of streets in fixing in his warrant the period of time over which street improvement bonds should extend, it being the statutory duty of the board of trustees to fix such period; the curative provisions remedying the defect.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨488, 489(5)—Validity of bonds cannot be questioned by property owner who did not appeal.

A property owner, after failing to appeal and complain that the superintendent of streets in his warrant for expenses of a street improvement, and not the board of trustees, fixed the period over which improvement bonds should extend, cannot question the validity of the bonds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by C. Cohn against C. M. Thompson and E. O. Thompson, as copartners doing business under the firm name of Thompson Bros., and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, and Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellants.

Matthew S. Platz and C. E. Arnold, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is on the judgment roll, and the contention of appellants is that, upon the findings, the judgment should have been in their favor. It appears that proceedings for certain street work in the city of Bakersfield were instituted and carried through under the provisions of the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147) and the Bond Act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 33). All the proceedings were entirely regular, except that the city council did not definitely designate the period of time over which the bonds should extend, the declaration of intention simply stating as to this that "said serial bonds shall extend over a period not to exceed five years from their date." After the completion of the work the superintendent of streets made out an assessment, diagram, and warrant covering the expenses of the work, and recorded them in his office. The warrant contained the following:

"Serial bonds bearing interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum and extending over a period of time ending four years from and after the second day of January next succeeding their date are to be issued to represent the cost and expense of the work described in the assessment," etc.

No person filed with the city clerk any objection in writing or appealed to the said board from or concerning said assessment or any act, or determination of the superintendent of streets concerning said assessment or otherwise. After the expiration of 30 days from the recording of the assessment, diagram, warrant and return of the superintendent of streets, he made out and certified to the city treasurer a complete list of the unpaid assessments, and thereupon the treasurer made out, signed, and issued to Thompson Bros., the contractors named in said warrant, bonds in proper form for said assessment on each lot of land designated. These bonds were issued August 23, 1912. The complaint herein was filed a few days later. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained January 18, 1913, and an amended and supplemental complaint, bringing in new parties plaintiff and defendant, on account of the conveyance and transfer of the land and of the bonds, was filed March 13, 1916, more than three years after said demurrer was sustained. A general demurrer to the amended complaint was overruled. The defendants answered, and, upon a stipulation of the facts, the trial court concluded that the assessment was legal and valid, but that the warrant and the bonds were illegal and void for the reason that the city council never at any time fixed the term of the bonds. This view of the court that the bonds were invalid involves the only question on this appeal.

Two points are made by appellants.

"(1) The failure of any person to appeal from the action of the superintendent of streets in fixing in the warrant the period of time over which the bonds should extend constituted a waiver of the objection. (2) It being found that the assessment itself is valid, and that it still constitutes a lien, the irregularity with respect to the warrant was cured by the issuance of the bonds."

It is conceded that it was the statutory duty of the board of trustees to fix the period over which the bonds should extend, and that the superintendent of streets had no such authority. But it appears by the decision in Cohn v. Federal Construction Co., 171 Cal. 547, 153 Pac. 916, which involved a similar resolution by the board of trustees of Bakersfield, that said board had authority at any time to fix said period definitely, and that thereafter another warrant and bond of binding force and effect could be issued. Hence it is strongly insisted by appellants that the case falls clearly within the doctrine of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81, stated as follows:

"By a long line of decisions it has become the settled doctrine that, with respect to any material defect or irregularity which could be cured by the council, the remedy by appeal is the only remedy; so that if the party does not appeal he waives the objection, and if he does appeal the judgment of the council is conclusive."

Herein, the defect was material, it could have been corrected by the trustees, and no doubt would have been if application had been made, but the property owner chose to sit idly by and decline to avail himself of the very remedy that has been provided to prevent such expensive and protracted litigation as this.

[1] But if the defect herein be considered too serious for the application of said principle, then, as we understand the decisions of the Supreme Court, it must be held that the situation is relieved by the operation of the curative provision of said bond act. Section 4 thereof, as amended by Stats. 1911, p. 1201, provides:

"Said bonds, by their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto under said street work act and under this act, previous to the making of the certified list of all assessments unpaid to the amount of twenty-five dollars or over by the street superintendent to the city treasurer, and of the validity of said lien up to the date of said list."

The effect to be given to such curative measures is very fully considered in Chase v. Trout, supra, and little more can be said. Therein it is stated:

"The correct proposition is that as the Legislature has power to devise any scheme for the assessment and levy of taxes for local improvements, provided such scheme includes such notice and opportunity for hearing to the owner of property taxed as will be sufficient to constitute the due process of law required by the Constitution, and otherwise complies with constitutional limitations and restrictions, so the Legislature, by a curative clause in the law establishing the scheme, may provide that the issuance of a bond, or the execution of a deed, in the enforcement of such levy or assessment, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all the required steps in the proceeding, excepting those that are necessary to constitute the due process of law, or to comply with any other constitutional prerequisite. As to all these other statutory steps or acts, the same power which prescribes them is competent to declare that their nonobservance shall not be fatal to the validity of the tax, and that no inquiry may be made concerning them. This is substantially the effect of the statute in question here. The conclusive evidence clause of section 4 of the Bond Act is a part of the law under which the proceeding was carried on, and its effect is the same as if it declared that, although all of these intermediate steps are directed, yet, if they are not performed as required, and the owner permits the matter to proceed until the bond is issued, he shall be thenceforth precluded from proof of such nonobservance and the requirements shall be conclusively presumed to have been complied with, excepting those which are necessary to comply with constitutional mandates."

The court proceeds to state with more particularity the essentials the nonobservance of which cannot be cured, but it is manifest that there has been herein no violation of any constitutional right, nor can it be said that the owner has not had the notice which constitutes due process of law. The defect herein had merely to do, as appellant suggests, "with the technical details of the process whereby the plaintiff was extended a substantial period of credit before meeting the obligation of an assessment regularly levied." Not one of his fundamental rights was violated or infringed, and it seems strange that he should attempt, upon the basis of an irregularity which has caused him no prejudice, to defeat these important memorials of a valid indebtedness held by purchasers for value, who had a right to rely upon said rule of the statute.

[2] The most recent consideration of the question by the Supreme Court is found in Watkinson v. Vaughn, 59 Cal. Dec. 76 (syllabus), wherein it is held that—

"In the matter of street improvement proceedings under the 'Improvement Act of 1911,' * * * the failure of the resolution of intention to expressly declare, as required by section 4 of the act, that the district described and to be assessed is the district to be benefited by the work of improvement is cured by the failure of the property owners, as provided by section 16 of the act, to make objection to such omission, and by the issuance, without objection, of bonds to pay for the improvement, which bonds, by section 66 of the act, by their issuance, are made conclusive evidence of the regularity of the proceedings."

Assuredly, the defect in that case was as serious as in this, and we feel no doubt that under the authorities and upon principle the respondent should not be permitted at this late date to question the validity of said bonds.

We think the judgment should be reversed as far as said bonds are concerned, and a judgment upon the findings be rendered, declaring said bonds to be valid and legal and for appellants' costs.

It is so ordered.

Corporations — 432(12)—Finding that pledge holder corporation and officer were estopped to claim prior lien proper under evidence.

Evidence held to sustain a finding that a pledge holder corporation was estopped to deny that it was bound by a contract made by its president to hold the pledge unconditionally for the pledgee, and that the president was also estopped to deny that he was bound to so hold for pledgee, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Walter A. Mayr against W. J. Reynolds and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants R. H. Raphael and the R. H. Raphael Realty Company appeal. Affirmed.

Hollzer & Greenberg, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an appeal by defendant R. H. Raphael from a judgment in favor of plaintiff establishing a first lien in plaintiff upon certain automobile material, and decreeing foreclosure thereof to satisfy plaintiff's claim.

The facts material to the opinion are:

That on the 25th day of July, 1916, the Merchants' Finance Company, a corporation, loaned to the Beardsley Electric Company, a corporation, $1,926.45, evidenced by a promissory note in that amount secured by a pledge of the automobile material which by agreement of the parties was deposited with the defendant R. H. Raphael Realty Company, a corporation. That on the 25th day of August, 1916, a month after this property had been so pledged and stored in premises leased by and under the possession of the realty company, the Beardsley Electric Company borrowed from plaintiff the sum of $5,000, evidenced by its four promissory notes and secured by a pledge of the same material. That before this loan was made the plaintiff learned of the existing claim and lien of the Merchants' Finance Company, and demanded that the property be cleared either by payment of the existing loan or by release of the security. This he was assured had been done, and as evidence thereof a receipt in the words following was delivered to him by a representative of the Beardsley Electric Company upon his payment to that company of the sum of $5,000:

"Received of Walter A. Mayr $35.00, being one month's rent of one-story brick building located at Eighth & Kohler streets. In addition to the rental for the use of this building, I agree to act as custodian for the electric vehicle material stored therein with respect to count and delivery of it, and I agree to honor only such orders as said Walter A. Mayr may issue to me as to the delivery of said material. R. H. Raphael Realty Co., by R. H. Raphael, Pres."

That on the 20th day of March, 1917, the Merchants' Finance Company sold and assigned to the defendant Raphael as an individual the note of the Beardsley Electric Company which it held, together with its interest in the pledge of the security. That thereafter the Beardsley Electric Company became insolvent, and the defendants Raphael and Raphael Realty Company, without notice to plaintiff or to any other person than certain individuals who were acting as agents and employes of these defendants, caused a pretended sale of said property to be made to an agent and employe of said Raphael for $2,000, although on numerous occasions Raphael had represented to the plaintiff that the value of said property was more than $20,000. The trial court found that the Raphael Realty Company, without consideration and in violation of its duty to plaintiff, and for the purpose of defeating the rights of plaintiff, had parted with the possession of the pledged property; that by reason of the circumstances heretofore recited the pretended sale was void and of no effect; that the property was actually in the possession of agents and employes of the defendant Raphael; that said defendant was estopped to deny that he held the security unconditionally for the plaintiff; and that the defendant Raphael Realty Company, by its failure to repudiate the action of its president, and by its retention of the property without any attempt on its part to exonerate itself after having full knowledge of plaintiff's claims and the assurances given to him, was further estopped to deny the binding character of the contract referred to as the "receipt" executed in the name of the company by R. H. Raphael. Upon these findings the court drew the conclusion that plaintiff's claim constituted a lien upon the pledged material prior and superior to any lien of any of the defendants, and gave judgment accordingly. The defendant R. H. Raphael alone appealed.

He attacks the judgment upon the ground that the trial court erroneously held that he was estopped to deny the validity of the pledge of the property made to respondent. The position of the trial judge upon this branch of the case is made clear by his oral opinion rendered at the close of the trial as quoted in appellant's opening brief:

"Then the question as to the priority of liens—there is no conflict in the evidence. It appears, as it seems to me, without any conflict, that at this time the Merchants' Finance Company did have a valid pledge of these goods which was made in good faith and for value. The Merchants' Finance Company itself has never done anything to surrender that pledge or to give any one else priority, and if it still held that note or if it had conducted that sale and bought in the property itself, or caused it to be sold by some process to any third party, who bought it without notice or knowledge of the peculiar circumstances existing between Mr. Raphael and Mr. Mayr, there would be no question in my mind whatever but that it took precedence of Mr. Mayr's claim here. But we have the curious circumstance that the only man claiming under or by virtue of that Merchants' Finance Company lien at this time is Mr. Raphael himself, and, as I have said, it appears to me that he is estopped to deny that Mr. Mayr's pledge was a valid pledge. He is estopped to deny that the Raphael Realty Company did take and hold this property as pledge holder for Mr. Mayr, undertaking to deliver it solely upon his order, which, as it now seems to me, would warrant this court in finding as against Mr. Raphael that the Raphael Realty Company was then the pledge holder for Mr. Mayr, and, if that finding is warranted, then it seems to me it follows, as a rule of law or a rule of equity rather, that not merely the Raphael Realty Company, but Mr. R. H. Raphael, as president of that company and the mouthpiece through which it spoke and the arm through which it acted, are estopped by the relationship of trust and confidence thereby created by them existing between him and his company, on the one hand, and Mr. Mayr, on the other, from secretly obtaining any advantage to himself adversely to Mr. Mayr."

The relationship of the appellant during the entire transaction is clearly presented by the evidence. He was vice president of the Beardsley Electric Company, the borrower of the first loan from the Merchants' Finance Company, of which he was also vice president. He was also vice president of the Beardsley Electric Company when it negotiated the loan from respondent. He was president of the R. H. Raphael Realty Company, the pledge holder under both pledges, president of the lessor of the warehouse where the goods were stored, member of the partnership whose employé was the nominal purchaser at the invalid sale, and was the real purchaser at that sale, which was conducted and participated in by persons wholly under his direction and control. Respondent knew of the relation of appellant to these various concerns, and had every reason to believe and rely upon the promises and assurances given him by appellant. That respondent made the loan only upon the written assurance of appellant that he would hold the material in controversy subject only to respondent's order, and upon the repeated assurances that the property was free from all other claims excepting freight and other minor charges which respondent was assured would be immediately paid, is not controverted. All the facts necessary to estop appellant were present.

"Whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true, and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it." Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3.

Appellant attempts to escape the unavoidable conclusion that he was estopped under these circumstances by the argument that, if any estoppel exists, the corporation realty company, and not the appellant individually, is estopped; but at the trial he urged that the realty company was not estopped because the receipt given respondent was executed by him without authority to the corporation. But the court found that he was the president of the corporation, and that the other stockholders left the affairs of the corporation to him, and that it was the custom and practice of the corporation not to question his acts; furthermore, in this particular instance, the corporation, well knowing that the receipt had been issued, made no attempt to repudiate it until an amended answer was filed in this proceeding by a minority stockholder acting without authority of the other stockholders, but under advice of counsel for the appellant. The corporation thus ratified the acts of its president and retained the benefits of his contract.

Upon this evidence the trial court correctly concluded that the corporation was estopped from denying the binding character of the contract made by the appellant as its president, and that appellant, as an individual, was estopped to deny that he was bound by the contract to hold the goods unconditionally for respondent.

For these reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. MILLER & LUX, Inc., et al. (two cases).
(L. A. 4993, 4994.)(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 1, 1920.)1. Waters and water courses ⇨152(8)—Evidence held to sustain conclusion plaintiff entitled to per cent. of waters allotted under settlement agreement.

In action to quiet title to water rights, evidence held to sustain court's conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to take 9.94 per cent. of the waters allotted to the first parties therein by a certain water settlement agreement of 1888, including waters accumulated by them in a reservoir, and to use them at any place it should think proper, either on lands riparian to the river or its branches or on other non-riparian lands, but that the use should be limited to lands owned by a party to the water settlement agreement, plaintiff's predecessor, on its date.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨158(1)—Agreement not describing land too uncertain to establish riparian rights.

Agreement between riparian owners, not describing any land, but merely showing the area signed for by the several parties, established no riparian rights of the parties in any land, being too uncertain, as such rights can exist only as part and parcel of specific tracts, and any contract must describe the land sufficiently for identification.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨39 — Only tracts acquired by single conveyance from state and abutting on stream entitled to riparian rights.

Only tracts acquired by single conveyance from the state and abutting on a stream are entitled to riparian rights.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨158(2)—Right to use water confined by agreement to land owned by party within certain townships.

Under provisions of water settlement agreement, right of a party thereto and of plaintiff as his successor to the use of water of a river held confined to its use on land owned by the party to the agreement on the date of its making and within certain townships.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨40—Right of riparian proprietor as against appropriators extends to entire stream.

The right of each riparian proprietor as against appropriators of water extends to the entire stream, however small a part of his land actually abuts thereon.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨152(5)—Defendant's claim of lien held proper for amendment in action to quiet title to water right.

In action to quiet title to water rights against claims of defendants, one of whom claimed that such rights as plaintiff had were part and parcel of plaintiff's land, either as a riparian right or as an appurtenance, it was proper for a defendant, if it had a claim, present or prospective, against plaintiff which would constitute a lien on the lands of which the water rights were a part, to assert the same by amending its answers and to have its lien established.

7. Pleading ⇨236(3)—Amendments during trial within discretion of court.

The matter of amending pleadings during trial is largely in the discretion of the trial court.

8. Executors and administrators ⇨315(5)—Decree of distribution established lien on land.

Decree of distribution in a decedent's estate declaring that a burden or charge in favor of the present defendant existed against certain land, and that it should run with and bind such land, established the claim in favor of defendant as a lien on the land described and declared to be subject thereto.

9. Executors and administrators ⇨315(1)—Probate court in distributing estate can declare lien in favor of third person.

The court in probate has power, in distributing the estate of a decedent, to declare a lien thereon in favor of a third person and that the distributee shall hold subject to such lien.

10. Executors and administrators ⇨315(1)—Lien imposed by distribution decree not void for uncertainty.

Decree of distribution of a decedent's estate declaring a lien on certain land in favor of a corporation which had a contingent claim against the estate for expenses to be incurred in certain water litigation held not void for uncertainty, in that the claim for which the lien was imposed was for moneys to become due in the future, whose amount could not be learned in advance, or as leaving it to the corporation to be the sole judge of the amount of expenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and another. From portions of the judgment, both parties appeal. Judgment modified and affirmed.

Edward F. Treadwell and McCutchen, Olney & Willard, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

M. P. Frasier, Hunsaker & Britt and Le Roy M. Edwards, and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, all of Los Angeles, and Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco, for respondent.

Case No. 4993.

SHAW, J. The defendants, Miller & Lux, Incorporated, and Kern County Land Company, separately appeal from portions of the judgment. They also respectively appeal from the order of the court denying motions to vacate the judgment and enter a different judgment on the findings and from the order of the court denying motions for a new trial. All the appeals are presented in one transcript of the record.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of a certain proportion of the waters of Kern river; that the defendants each claim interests or rights in the waters belonging to plaintiff; that the claims of the defendants are without right and that none of the defendants has any interest therein. The prayer is that the plaintiff be declared to be the owner of said proportion of said waters; that its title thereto be quieted against the claims of the defendants thereto; and that the plaintiff be declared entitled "to use and dispose of its share of said waters as aforesaid in any manner, at any place, and for any purpose it may think proper." The judgment was in accordance with this prayer.

The claim of appellants is that plaintiff's right to use the water is a riparian right appurtenant to certain lands; that it has no right to use it on other lands; and that its use is subject to the reasonable use of other riparian owners along the stream, including the appellants. The question whether the water right of the plaintiff is that of a riparian owner only or is a right arising out of contract or appropriation depends on transactions and conduct during a period extending from 1879 to 1911, and it will be necessary to give as briefly as possible a history of the origin of the right and of the subsequent transactions throwing light upon its nature and character.

Kern river emerges from the foothills into the valley about 4 miles northeast of Bakersfield. From thence it now runs northerly of Bakersfield about 20 miles to the lower part of the valley, and there turns and flows northwest and north some 30 miles or more to Tulare lake. It has in the course of years changed its course from time to time. The water in times of flood will spread out of the regular channel and find its way in part through the sloughs or old channels. Formerly the main channel turned to the south shortly after emerging from the foothills and ran easterly of Bakersfield nearly south to Kern lake, thence westerly to Buena Vista lake and on to Tulare lake. In high floods it now divides near Buena Vista lake, part of the water flowing into that lake and another part running down Buena Vista slough toward Tulare lake. We speak, of course, of conditions as they would have been but for the changes which have been made by the several parties interested to control the course of the water. The interests of the several parties in the land involved in this action were acquired by them prior to the year 1879. Haggin, Tevis, Carr, and others had acquired large tracts of land, apparently, for the most part, not riparian to the stream, but which were irrigable by means of canals from Kern river, and they had made canals and thereby diverted a large part of the water of the river and were applying the same to the irrigation of lands situated in the vicinity of Bakersfield and south, southwest, and northerly thereof. Miller & Lux, Frederick Cox, C. W. Clarke, Reddington, Livermore, Cornwell, Bonestell, and Stebbins had acquired large tracts further down the valley, to which the water of the river, at least in times of flood, naturally would flow, if not intercepted. The diversions by Haggin and the others had the effect of preventing this flow. Thereupon Miller & Lux and others, on May 12, 1879, began the historic action of Lux v. Haggin, the decision of which by the Supreme Court is found in volume 69 of California Reports, extending from page 264 to page 439, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. Its object was to enjoin the diversions above mentioned, and it was based on the claim that the lands of the plaintiffs were riparian to the river or its branches and sloughs and that the diversions of the defendants were invasions of the riparian rights of the plaintiffs in the waters naturally flowing therein. The opinion in the case clearly shows that the principal question for decision was whether the right of a riparian owner or that of an appropriator or mere diverter was the superior right to the waters of the stream, under the law of California. On November 3, 1879, the plaintiffs therein, together with the said Frederick Cox and C. W. Clarke, executed an agreement relating to the prosecution of said action.

This agreement recited that—the parties thereto, "being owners of land in Kern county, California, on and adjacent to Kern lake, Buena Vista lake, the slough connecting said lakes, and on Buena Vista slough, all of which said lands have a common interest in the assertion, preservation, and maintenance of the 'riparian rights' of the said land derived by the water of Kern river through and by Kern lake, Buena Vista lake, and Buena Vista slough, and whereas the said riparian rights are threatened and in danger by the diversion of the waters of Kern river by sundry adverse claiming parties, who are illegally diverting the said waters and preventing their natural and heretofore continuous flow through the above-described channels and the lands of the parties subscribing hereto; and whereas such damaging, and illegal diversion can best be met by united action in litigation of all the parties in interest for the establishment and maintenance of the riparian rights of the hereinbefore mentioned land:

"Now, therefore, the said parties do hereby associate themselves together for the prosecution of such litigation, and do pledge themselves each to the other that they will share all proper expenses of such litigation in the proportion of the number of acres of land set opposite to their respective signatures hereto, and that the association shall continue to exist until the final termination of all litigation necessary to establish the riparian rights of the said lands, it being expressly stipulated that should any party or parties during the pendency of such litigation sell his or their lands or any portion thereof, he or they shall nevertheless pay his or their pro rata of cost of such litigation to the final end thereof, notwithstanding any such sale during the pendency thereof."

The parties signed this agreement and each wrote the number of acres claimed by him opposite his name, as follows:

Clarke & Cox	14,520	acres
Miller & Lux	36,644	"
John H. Reddington	13,283	"
George N. Cornwell	8,000	"
L. H. Bonestell	1,920	"
Horatio B. Livermore	22,541	"
Horatio Stebbins	1,280	"

The total number of acres was 98,188.

Thereafter the said action was prosecuted in the superior court and judgment was rendered therein in favor of the defendants. The appeal was taken by the plaintiffs and the final decision was made as above stated. The case attracted a great deal of attention throughout the state, and it is a matter of history that it was made an issue in the political campaigns of 1884 and 1886, and was a subject of agitation at the legislative sessions of 1885 and 1887, as a result of which section 1422 of the Civil Code, declaring that "the rights of riparian proprietors are not affected by the provisions of this title," was repealed by the Legislature of 1887 (St. 1887, p. 114). The judgment of the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the court below and remanded the cause for a new trial. The opinion, however, settled the controversy between the parties as to the superiority of riparian rights in favor of the plaintiffs in the action, and the cause was not tried again. Reddington, Livermore, and Bonestell had in the meantime conveyed their lands to Miller & Lux. Instead of having a new trial, the parties settled their controversy by an elaborate contract executed on July 28, 1888, and known in that region as the "Lux-Haggin Contract," or as the "Water Settlement Agreement."—It was signed by a large number of persons who were not parties to the action. The parties to this agreement designated as parties of the first part included all the persons who signed the agreement of November 3, 1879, except those who had sold their interests to some of the other parties thereto as aforesaid, and also the Kern Valley Water Company, a corporation which operated a canal to take water to the lands of said parties, or some of them, and which was apparently a mere agency for the use by them of the riparian rights or waters claimed by them. The parties of the second part were composed of two classes: First, corporations operating canals for the diversion and distribution of the waters of the river to others, under rights by appropriation; second, persons claiming rights to receive such waters from said corporations for use on their respective tracts of land. The agreement recited that the several parties executing it either claimed to own lands along the river and its branches, with riparian rights in the water, or other lands irrigated or susceptible of irrigation from water of said river, or claimed rights to divert water from the river and distribute and sell the same for the irrigation of lands not riparian to the river. One recital is as follows:

"All of the aforesaid owners of and claimants in said lands claim to have in connection with or as appurtenant to, or as a part and parcel of, said lands, certain riparian or other rights to the waters of said river, slough, or lakes, or some thereof."

The parties holding or claiming rights by appropriation took their water from the river at points above the lands claimed by the parties of the first part and above the head of the canal of the Kern Valley Water Company. The agreement provided that the water of the river should be measured at two places; one at a point where the river debouches from the foothills, called "the first point of measurement," a short distance above the headgate of the Kern Island Irrigating Canal Company; the other, designated as "the second point of measurement," located in the river some 20 miles or more further down the stream and below the intakes of all ditches owned by any of the parties of the second part. Of the water found to be at the first point of measurement 300 cubic feet per second was to be delivered to the Kern Island Irrigating Canal Company. Of the balance, one-third was allotted to the so-called parties of the first part, and two-thirds was allotted to the parties of the second part. The one-third to go to the first parties was to be delivered without diminution at the second point of measurement. This division was to continue during the irrigating season, that is, from March 1 to August 31 of each year. During the remaining months the second parties were to have all the water not taken by said Kern Island Irrigating Canal Company to use as they saw fit, but whatever they suffered to flow down through the second point of measurement was to go to the parties of the first part. The instrument declares that the shares of water thus allotted to the parties of the first part were "to be used and disposed of by them in any manner, at any place, and for any purpose they may think proper, or arrange or agree among themselves." The same language was used with reference to the rights of the parties of the second part in the waters allotted to them by the agreement, and the 300 cubic feet of said Kern Island Irrigating Canal Company was also "to be used and disposed of in any manner at any place, and for any purpose it should think proper." The agreement also provided that for the benefit of the parties of the first part levees should be constructed around a large lake known as Buena Vista lake, into which a part of the water of the Kern river naturally ran, so as to make of said lake to some extent an artificial reservoir in which should be confined the waters of the river flowing at the second point, at times when there was more than was then in use by the first parties, to be there stored for use subsequently by the parties of the first part. The expense of constructing the levees and other works necessary for conducting the water in and out of the reservoir and for controlling the flow was to be paid one-half by the first parties and one-half by the second parties. A part of such expenses of maintaining such levees, canals, and other works, after the construction thereof, were, however, to be borne by the parties of the first part.

The agreement (paragraph 17) declared that it should be perpetual and should be construed "as a covenant running with all the land owned or claimed by any of the parties hereto which is situated in the following townships or portions of townships," here describing 30 congressional townships and portions of others, extending from township 25 on the north to township 32 on the south, and from range 22 on the west to range 28 on the east, embracing a large part of the valley land of Kern county. It also declared that the parties of the first part "do hereby grant and convey unto said parties of the second part" all the waters and water rights to which the second parties were declared to be entitled thereby, and that in like manner the parties of the second part "do hereby grant and convey unto the said parties of the first part * * * all and singular the waters, water rights, privileges, and easements to which said parties of the first part are respectively, by paragraph third of this instrument, declared entitled, or which are or are intended to be by said paragraph apporportioned to them respectively." The waters to which the first parties were declared to be entitled by said third paragraph of the instrument was the one-third of the water flowing at the first point of measurement and delivered at the second point of measurement, as above stated, together with the surplus waters allowed to run by the second point of measurement during the six months following each irrigating season, as above stated. Paragraph third further declares that the second parties each "hereby acknowledges the right of the parties of the first part as riparian proprietors in Kern river, Buena Vista slough, Kern and Buena Vista lakes, and the slough connecting said lakes, to the proportion of the water flowing in Kern river hereinbefore agreed upon, and that as such riparian proprietors they shall at all times be entitled to receive at the second point of measurement during the months of March, April, May, June, July, and August, of each year, the amount of water they are so entitled to." It also provided that Henry Miller should act as the agent for the first parties in the construction of the reservoir. The evidence shows that by common consent, after the execution of the agreement of 1888, Henry Miller acted as the manager and agent of said first parties in the affairs of common interest connected with their water rights under said agreement, until after the commencement of the present action.

In 1879 Miller & Lux were partners and the property in controversy, so far as Miller & Lux were concerned, was the property of said firm. Lux afterwards died and the affairs of the firm were managed by Henry Miller as surviving partner until the settlement of the estate of Lux. In that settlement a corporation was formed under the name of "Miller & Lux" and the property of the firm was transferred to said corporation, which thereafter operated under the management of Miller. In our further discussion we shall use the name Miller & Lux to designate all that was done either by Miller personally or by Miller & Lux in the management of the common affairs of the first parties to said agreement of 1888.

The record does not show that any express agreement was ever made between said parties of the first part defining their respective shares or proportions of the waters allotted to them by said water settlement agreement of 1888. Nor was there any agreement between them expressly declaring the nature or origin of the water rights claimed by the first parties except as it is to be found in the aforesaid agreements of November 3, 1879, and July 28, 1888. The appellants claim that these agreements, when considered in connection with the matter in controversy in Lux v. Haggin, to which it referred, together with the subsequent conduct of the parties interested in the 98,188 acres of land referred to in the agreement of 1879, and the contents of other instruments of writing to which Cox was a party, conclusively establish the fact that the water rights secured by the parties of the first part in the water settlement agreement of 1888, and now in controversy, were riparian rights possessed by the parties, respectively, solely by virtue of the ownership of portions of the 98,188 acres of land, and pertaining only to those lands. They also claim that, even if the rights are not riparian in character, the evidence conclusively shows that the respective water rights of said parties so obtained are rights appurtenant to said 98,188 acres of land, and none other, and that none of the first parties or their successors in interest can rightfully apply the same to other lands without the consent of the others.

The respondent insists that from the several contracts made by the parties, together with other evidence, there arises a necessary implication, or at least a reasonable inference, that the parties of the first part in said water settlement agreement of 1888 are each entitled to a share in the water allotted to them by that agreement in the same proportion as he was called on to pay the expenses aforesaid, that of Cox being equal to 9.94 per cent. of the whole allotment, and that this interest is not attached to any land as a riparian right, but that the water it represents may be used at any place to which Cox or his successors in interest may wish to take it. The respondent also claims that the water settlement agreement of 1888, if properly construed, constitutes a grant to each of the parties of the first part of his proportionate share of the water, for use at any place he sees fit.

[1] We think the evidence is sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the court below that the plaintiff was entitled to take 9.94 per cent. of the waters allotted to the first parties by the agreement of 1888, including the waters accumulated by them in Buena Vista reservoir, and to use the same at any place it should think proper, either on lands riparian to the river or its branches or on other non-riparian lands, but that the use should be limited to lands owned by Cox on July 28, 1888.

[2] The agreement of 1879 is not sufficient of itself to establish the riparian rights of the parties thereto in any land. It is too uncertain to have that effect. It does not describe any land, but merely shows the area "signed for," as one of the witnesses expressed it, by the several parties. Riparian rights can exist only as part and parcel of specific tracts of land, and any contract relating thereto would be void for uncertainty and of no avail unless it describes or refers to the land in a manner sufficient for identification. The number of acres "signed for" by the parties aggregates 98,188, Clarke & Cox signing for 14,520 acres. The evidence shows that Clarke & Cox at that time owned 24,880 acres of land in common, in Kern county, situated within the congressional townships enumerated in paragraph 17 of the agreement of 1888. The agreement of 1888 declares that it shall be construed as a covenant running with all the land owned or claimed by any of the parties thereto situated in said townships. It appears that Clarke & Cox made a partition of their lands. The court finds that Cox owned 30,940 acres of land in said townships at the time the agreement of 1888 was made. The evidence shows that a large part of it was the land owned by Clarke & Cox in 1879 and that only a comparatively small part of it, much less than 10,000 acres, was actually riparian to the river or its branches. Until the agreement of 1888 was made Cox contributed to the expense of litigation a sum equal to his proportion of the 98,188 acres "signed for" in the agreement of 1879. Thereafter he contributed in the same proportion to the expenses of the parties of the first part in constructing Buena Vista reservoir and to the expenses of its subsequent maintenance and operation. Miller & Lux, as managers for the parties of the first part, made contracts for the sale of water to other persons, receiving therefor several hundred thousand dollars and in some instances receiving monthly rentals of substantial amounts, for all of which it accounted to the first parties and paid to Cox his share thereof in proportion to his share of the lands aforesaid. Miller personally, as agent or trustee, also obtained title to the lands covered by said reservoir and conveyed to Cox and others of the first parties each a share therein, proportioned to his ownership in the acreage signed for in the agreement of 1879. The proportion of the expenses and receipts paid to and by Cox obviously was fixed by reference to his ownership of the part of the land owned by Clarke & Cox in 1879. The evidence identifies only 3,840 acres of this land, and it is impossible to determine therefrom whether the remainder of it is or was at any time riparian to said river or any of its branches. There is evidence as to the identity of the lands "signed for" in the agreement of 1879 by each of the other parties thereto, except Miller & Lux, and it appears therefrom that a large part of that land was not riparian to the stream or any of its branches.

[3] At the time the agreement of 1879 was made, the extent to which riparian rights attached to lands owned by one person, consisting of adjoining parcels, one of which, only, abuts upon the stream, was not well understood in this state. Many persons supposed that such rights extended to all the lands owned by a single person, although obtained by separate conveyances, some of which did not convey any land abutting upon the stream, providing all the parcels were contiguous. The land was for the most part swamp land which the parties had acquired from the state. It is not improbable that the parties to that agreement understood that they would have riparian rights in the stream for all of their lands if it was all contiguous to land which did abut upon the stream. When the contract of 1888 was made, however, the opinion in Lux v. Haggin had definitely declared that only those tracts which were acquired by a single conveyance from the state and which abutted upon the stream were entitled to riparian rights. 69 Cal. 424, 425, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674. The parties must be presumed to have known this, since they were interested in that case, and the agreement of 1888 must be understood to have been made with knowledge of this principle. It is now well settled. Boehmer v. Big Rock I. D., 117 Cal. 27, 48 Pac. 908; Alta, etc., Co. v.

Hancock, 85 Cal. 227, 24 Pac. 645, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217; Anaheim, etc., Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 331, 88 Pac. 978; Gallatin v. Corning I. Co., 163 Cal. 416, 126 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74. It is apparent from that document that the first parties intended to secure the water allotted to them for the benefit of all the lands they owned at that time to which it was feasible to carry the water. But they must have known that the riparian rights did not extend to a large part of those lands, and hence the court below might reasonably have drawn the inference that they intended that each of the first parties should have the right to use his share of the allotted water upon any land he then owned situated in the townships enumerated in paragraph 17 thereof, whether riparian or not. This being the case, it is obvious that the right in the waters so allotted was not exclusively riparian in character.

[4] It does not follow, however, that the plaintiff, as successor of Cox, has the absolute right to the share of water in controversy and is entitled to use it at any place or to sell it to others for use on lands not owned by Cox in 1888, or, if then owned by him, not within the townships enumerated in paragraph 17 of the agreement of 1888. That paragraph not only contains the statement above quoted as to its provisions running with all the land owned by any of the parties situated within said townships, but it also declares that all said land "shall be subject to" all its provisions, into whosever hands it may come by transfer or otherwise from said parties. And paragraph 23 provides that the personal liability imposed under paragraph 17 should be deemed to be the liability of the person who should own the land at the time the liability should accrue, and the party who conveyed his interest "in said lands" should thereafter be freed from all liability under the agreement "to the extent and in the proportion" that the lands sold by him bear to the "whole amount of such lands * * * theretofore owned" by him. These provisions have the effect, by necessary implication at least, to confine the provisions of the agreement and the application thereof, so far as the first parties are concerned, to the lands then owned by them and situated within said townships. It follows that the right of Cox, and of the plaintiff as his successor, to the use of the water is confined to its use on land owned by Cox on July 28, 1888, and within said townships.

The subsequent conduct of the parties implies an understanding between them that there was an even narrower restriction, that is, a limitation of the use to the 98,188 acres "signed for" in the agreement of 1879. It is apparent that Miller and Cox must have known what lands were there referred to, for whenever by conveyances between them their comparative ownerships of that acreage were changed, the proportion of Cox in the common expense paid out by Miller & Lux in maintaining the reservoir was changed accordingly by Miller & Lux in rendering the account to Cox, always with the number 98,188 as the denominator of the fraction, and Cox acquiesced therein and paid his share so computed. Likewise, the distribution of the large receipts from sales of water or water rights was made in the same proportions, and Cox received his diminished share without objection. If the identity of the 98,188 acres had been shown, there might be good reason for such further restriction of the use, but as the case stands there is no means of ascertaining the lands comprising that acreage and that restriction cannot be declared or enforced, and we are bound by the broader area described in the agreement of 1888; it being the only writing on the subject which contains a description capable of being made certain.

The case is, we think, distinguishable in this respect from Calkins v. Sorosis, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 426, 88 Pac. 1094. In that case the court said that, while by the covenant in the agreement the water right was made an easement appurtenant to the land of the plaintiff, yet:

"We look in vain to the agreement or to this covenant to find anything limiting or restricting the use of the water to the lands of plaintiff. It is not a case where, by the very terms of the conveyance, the right to use the water was expressly limited to lands to which the right was made appurtenant." 150 Cal. 431, 432, 88 Pac. 1096.

And so it was held that the plaintiff might sell the water to others for use on other land. In this case, as we have said, the agreement of 1888 necessarily implies such a limitation upon the use. Furthermore, it is to be remarked on this point that the agreement as a whole, in connection with the circumstances under which it was made and the object sought to be attained, thereby indicates strongly that such a limitation was understood.

We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in adjudging to the plaintiff the unlimited right to use the water at any place it should think proper. It should have restricted the use to the lands owned by Cox on July 28, 1888, situated within the townships aforesaid.

The point just stated may not be of great importance. It does not appear that the plaintiff intended to make any other use of the water than we have held it has the right to make. But the future might develop other desires or interests on that subject, and it is proper that the judgment should be modified so as to state the rights of the parties accurately. This modification was not the object sought by these appeals, and we do not think it should have the effect of carrying costs in favor of the appellant.

[5] The clause in the third paragraph of the agreement of 1888, by which the second parties acknowledge the right of the first parties as riparian proprietors along the river and its branches to the proportion of water allotted to said first parties, is not sufficient to defeat the conclusion we have reached. Since the right of each riparian proprietor as against appropriators extends to the entire stream, the first parties would each have the right as riparian proprietors to all of the waters thereof, although only a small part of the land of each actually abutted upon the stream. The second parties all claim solely by appropriation. An acknowledgment by them of the riparian rights of the first parties would therefore be appropriate if any part of the lands of each of the first parties was contiguous to the stream, and it does not of necessity imply that all of it was so contiguous or was entitled to riparian rights.

There are other circumstances appearing in the evidence which are of some weight as tending to the conclusion that the right secured to the first parties in the agreement of 1888 was not considered by them as exclusively of a riparian character, and that they did not understand that they were not entitled to use it upon lands not in fact riparian to the stream. We do not deem it necessary to state these matters in detail. It is sufficient to say that upon the whole case we think the findings complained of, except as above stated, are sustained by sufficient evidence.

The plaintiff has appealed from certain parts of the judgment entered in the court below declaring that certain lands owned by the plaintiff, as successor to Frederick Cox, are subject to a charge in favor of Miller & Lux for a portion of the expenses that might be incurred in future by that corporation in maintaining and operating the Buena Vista reservoir and in constructing other canals and works for the control of the waters owned in common by the parties of the first part to the agreement of 1888. This appeal is numbered L. A. 4994 and is presented upon the same record as case No. 4993.

The court found that the plaintiff had acquired all or a large part of the land formerly owned by Cox, situated in the townships enumerated in paragraph 17 of said agreement, and that it had afterwards sold a large part of said land to other persons, with reservations excluding from the conveyance whatever rights the plaintiff had in the water allotted to the first parties by the agreement of 1888 aforesaid, and that the plaintiff still owned certain parcels of said land, describing them, situated in township 27 south, range 22 east, aforesaid, containing 3,840 acres. The judgment declared that this

3,840 acres was subject to the charge aforesaid for the future expenses to be incurred and paid by Miller & Lux as aforesaid in the common enterprise of maintaining their water rights and works.

Frederick Cox died in the year 1906. Administration of his estate took place in the superior court of Sacramento county. The decree settling the final account and making distribution thereof was entered in that court on April 18, 1908. During the administration Miller & Lux presented a claim against the estate for the contingent expenses thereafter to be incurred by it in maintaining and operating said reservoir and waterworks. Said corporation also filed a contingent claim for moneys to become due to Miller & Lux under an agreement executed between Miller & Lux on October 6, 1898, providing for the construction of certain canals and the payment of rental therefor in case they were made use of by Cox and for the payment of part of the expense thereof by Cox. Both claims were duly allowed in the course of administration. At the time of the final settlement these claims had not been adjusted or disposed of in any way. As they must of necessity arise in the future and the amounts were not then determinable, they could not be adjusted by a present payment. Upon the hearing, all of the parties entitled to distribution were present in open court together with the attorney for Miller & Lux, and thereupon in pursuance of an agreement between them made in open court a decree of distribution was by consent of all parties made and entered distributing the aforesaid 3,840 acres of land to the residuary devisees and declaring that the same was subject to a charge and burden imposed thereon by the provisions of the agreement of 1888 aforesaid in favor of Miller & Lux, and that said burden and charge was "to run with and bind said lands," and imposing a charge upon the said land for the expense to be incurred and moneys to become due under said agreement of October 6, 1898, which also was "to run with and bind said lands."

During the trial of the present action in the court below the defendant Miller & Lux, by leave of court, filed an amendment to its answer setting up these charges and burdens as a lien against the aforesaid lands asking a judgment declaring the plaintiffs should hold said land subject to said charges and burdens. The court made findings in accordance with the amendment and judgment was rendered accordingly imposing upon said 3,800 acres of land a lien for the charges and burdens mentioned in favor of said Miller & Lux.

lands, including said 3,840 acres, against the alleged unfounded claims of the defendants. Miller & Lux claimed that such water rights as plaintiff had were part and parcel of the said 3,840 acres of land, either as a riparian right or as an appurtenance thereto. It was proper, therefore, for the defendant, if it had a claim, present or prospective, against the plaintiff which would constitute a lien upon said lands of which the water rights were a part, to assert the same and have its lien established in the action to quiet title. The matter of amending pleadings during the trial is largely in the discretion of the trial court, and we see nothing in the record to indicate any abuse of discretion in allowing the answer to be amended as aforesaid.

[8] Appellant also claims that the part of the judgment appealed from is based on the theory that the covenants of the agreement of 1888 were covenants running with the land, and that they are not of that character. We do not think this proposition is of any importance. It is immaterial what the nature of those covenants was. The judgment of the court below was obviously based upon the lien or burden established by the decree of distribution in the estate of Cox. That decree declared that this burden or charge existed against the land and that it should "run with and bind the land." By this language the claim in favor of Miller & Lux was established as a lien upon the 3,840 acres of land described therein and declared to be subject thereto. Fresno C. & I. Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 116, 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112; Fresno C. & I. Co. v. Dunbar, 80 Cal. 535, 22 Pac. 275. It is therefore immaterial whether the covenants of the agreement of 1888 were or were not covenants running with the land. Whatever their character, the effect thereof was adjudicated in the decree of distribution, which was binding upon the distributees to whose title the plaintiff has succeeded.

[9] Appellant insists that part of the decree of distribution imposing upon the land the lien above mentioned was void for two reasons: First, because it was beyond the jurisdiction of the court to make such a decree; second, because its provisions are so uncertain as to render it unenforceable. We think there is no doubt of the jurisdiction of the court to enter the decree. This is not a case where the court was endeavoring to determine a controversy between the distributees and third persons regarding the title to the land distributed, adverse to the title of the decedent or to the title of distributee. Cases holding that the court has no jurisdiction to determine such controversies upon the final settlement of the estate in probate are not in point here. Miller & Lux claimed that it had a contingent claim against the estate for expenses thereafter to be incurred, and that such claim was a charge or lien upon a part of the land about to be distributed. The court was making a final settlement of the estate. In order to do so it was necessary that it should make some provision regarding the payment of said claim. It had jurisdiction of the parties and of the property for all purposes necessary to the settlement of the estate. The residuary devisees, the only persons interested in the land as successors of Cox, were present in court and agreed to the distribution made and to the imposition of the lien. It has often been decided that the court in probate has power, in distributing the estate of a decedent, to declare a lien thereon in favor of a third person, and that the distributee shall hold it subject to such lien. Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 530, 31 Pac. 584; Finnerty v. Pennie, 100 Cal. 407, 34 Pac. 869; Estate of Boyes, 151 Cal. 151, 90 Pac. 454; Estate of Clanton, 171 Cal. 386, 153 Pac. 459.

[10] The contention that the decree is void for uncertainty is also untenable. The claim for which the lien was imposed was for moneys to become due in the future, the amount of which could not be determined in advance. If the lien existed it could be enforced when the moneys became due to Miller & Lux under the provisions of the agreement of 1888 aforesaid and the agreement of October 6, 1898, aforesaid, both of which were referred to in the decree of distribution. The amount thereof could be established at that time, but not before. The plaintiff argues that the decree leaves it to Miller & Lux to be the sole judges of the amount of expenses to be incurred and therefore delegated to that corporation the functions of the court. This, however, is obviously not the case. The decree of distribution merely imposed the lien for whatever amount should legally become due thereafter to Miller & Lux on account of the agreements referred to. It would, of course, be necessary, if there was any dispute about these amounts, or their validity or legality, that Miller & Lux should resort to a court of competent jurisdiction to establish and enforce its lien. That corporation would not be the sole judge of the legality or extent of the charges to be imposed. If they were not justified under the contracts referred to, if they were improper charges, or if the contracts do not authorize Miller & Lux to charge the expenses claimed against the owner of the land, then, of course, the court to which the matter was submitted would refuse to declare or enforce a lien therefor. We find no merit in the points made in support of this appeal.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by striking out the words "at any place within its lawful control, and for any lawful purpose it may think proper, whether on lands riparian to said Kern river, Buena Vista slough, Kern and Buena Vista lakes, the slough connecting said lakes, or elsewhere," found at the end of the first paragraph of the part of the judgment declaring the rights of the plaintiff immediately following the words "and to use and dispose of the same in any lawful manner," and inserting instead thereof the following:

"Upon any lands owned by Frederick Cox on July 28, 1888, situated in any of the congressional townships and portions of townships described in paragraph 17 of the agreement of July 28, 1888, attached to the complaint and marked Exhibit A thereto, but not elsewhere."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The court below is directed, upon the going down of the remittitur, to re-enter the judgment as thus modified. The respective respondents are to recover costs of appeal from the respective appellants in each case.

SEAMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF MARIN COUNTY et al. (S. F. 9331.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 26, 1920.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit § 60(6) — Court properly refused to dismiss cross-complaint for failure to return summons.

The court was justified in refusing to dismiss a cross-complaint on the ground that summons had not been returned within three years, where the delay was occasioned wholly at the request of the movant and for his benefit.

2. Process § 150—Jurisdiction of cross-complaint not lost on failure to return summons within three years.

Code Civ. Proc. § 581a, under which court loses jurisdiction where summons is not returned within three years, does not apply to a cross-complaint, notwithstanding section 442 as amended by St. 1909, p. 966, providing for a summons on a cross-complaint.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit § 60(1) — Courts have inherent power to dismiss cross-complaint for lack of diligence in prosecution.

Courts have inherent power to dismiss a cross-complaint for lack of diligence in its prosecution.

In Bank. Petition by Russell G. Seaman, individually and as executor of the last will of George B. Seaman, deceased, for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of the County of Marin, and Honorable E. T. Zook, Judge thereof. Transferred from District Court of Appeal on respondent's motion. Application denied.

James H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

George H. Harlan, of San Rafael, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. [1-3] Petitioner applied for a writ of prohibition to the District Court of Appeal, and a peremptory writ was ordered. On respondent's motion the case was subsequently transferred to this court. Petitioner seeks to prohibit the respondent from proceeding with the trial of the issues on a cross-complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage, in which the Bank of Sausalito, a defendant, had answered and filed a cross-complaint, September 14, 1915, for the foreclosure of a first mortgage; the original action having been begun October 13, 1913, to foreclose a second mortgage. Summons was issued upon the cross-complaint, and served September 23, 1915. The affidavit of service was immediately indorsed thereon. In order to allow the defendant, who had defaulted in the original foreclosure action and on the cross-complaint, an opportunity to try to sell the property and realize something out of his equity, and because of his earnest solicitation, and in accordance with a written stipulation to that effect, the summons was not filed until September 22, 1919; the defendant having agreed to pay the interest upon the mortgage of the Bank of Sausalito and to make efforts to sell the property. The defendant Seamans paid the interest to January 31, 1919, and a small amount ($25) on account of the principal. He died March 27, 1919. His son, having been appointed the executor of his estate, makes this application to prohibit the further prosecution of the cross-complaint on the ground that the summons, though served within time, was not filed within three years after the filing of the cross-complaint, thus depriving the court of jurisdiction to proceed thereon. So far as the trial court has any discretion in the matter, it has been already exercised against the petitioner by a denial of a motion to dismiss the cross-complaint, and the fact that the delay was occasioned wholly at the request of the defendant and for his benefit would amply justify such decision if the court has any discretionary power. The petitioner relies upon section 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, as construed in Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 305, 45 Pac. 470; White v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 247, 58 Pac. 450; holding that the court loses jurisdiction where the summons is not returned within three years, and the question is as to whether the rule is different on a cross-complaint. At the time section 581a was enacted in 1907 the law did not require the issuance or service or return of summons upon a cross-complaint. White v. Patton, 87 Cal. 151, 25 Pac. 270; Rodgers v. Parker, 136 Cal. 313, 68 Pac. 975. Consequently, at the time section 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, was enacted it did not apply to a cross-complaint. In 1909 (St. 1909, p. 966) section 442, Code of Civil Procedure, was amended to provide, for the first time, for a summons upon a cross-complaint. The provision then added by amendment is as follows:

"If any of the parties affected by the cross-complaint have not appeared in the action, a summons upon the cross-complaint must be issued and served upon them in the same manner as upon the commencement of an original action."

It is contended by petitioner that by reason of this amendment to section 442 the provisions of 581a now apply, to which the respondent replies that section 442 does not now require the summons to be "returned," and that section 442 does not change the previous meaning of section 581a. As 581a, at the time of its enactment, did not apply to an action upon a cross-complaint, it follows that it would apply thereto only because of the amendment to 442. It is true that, for some purposes, a cross-complaint is regarded as the beginning of an entirely new action, but it is nevertheless a part and portion of the original action, and differs from a new action in this essential particular, namely, that the cross-complainant is brought into court by the plaintiff and does not come of his own volition. The reasons for a dismissal in the latter case may be as cogent as in the former, but in the absence of legislation depriving the court of jurisdiction, it has still power to proceed, and the mere amendment of section 442, providing for a summons on a cross-complaint, would not have that effect. No harm can come from such a construction, because of the inherent power of the court to dismiss for lack of diligence in the prosecution of a cross-complaint; while an arbitrary rule requiring a dismissal might work great injustice, and would here, where the statute of limitations has run against a new action, or the period for filing claims against an estate has expired, as in this case.

In re SIMONTON'S ESTATE.

SIMONTON et al. v. LEITER et al.

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 24, 1920.)

1. Executors and administrators $\S$ 513(15)—Settlement of widow's account as executrix determined property not inventoried or accounted for was hers.

Presentation of widow's account as deceased husband's executrix and petition for its settlement presented, as between her and her husband's descendants and legatees, the question as to what property in her hands was part of the estate, so that settlement of her account involved a conclusive determination in her favor that certain property in her name at her husband's death, and not inventoried or accounted for by her as a part of his estate, was her own and not his or community property.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 513(9)—Order of settlement conclusive on executrix and persons beneficially interested.

Order of settlement of a widow's accounts as executrix of her deceased husband when it became final as between her and those beneficially interested in the estate was conclusive upon her as to the ownership of any property for which she was held accountable, and was conclusive upon those beneficially interested as to any for which she was not held and which she did not withhold from her accounts fraudulently or by mistake.

3. Executors and administrators $\S$ 513(9)—Settlement of executrix conclusive as between her successors and persons interested in estate.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1960, settlement of account of executrix, conclusive as between herself and persons beneficially interested in the estate, is conclusive as between such persons and the executrix's successors in interest.

4. Husband and wife $\S$ 274(1)—Code provision as to inheritance by persons not relatives of decedent, but relatives of decedent's spouse, construed.

Civ. Code, $\S$ 1386, subd. 8, providing that if deceased is a widow and leaves no issue, and the estate or any portion was common property of decedent and her deceased spouse while he was living, the property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse, applies only to community property received by will or inheritance or retained by virtue of its character; if the husband is the survivor it applies to the community property which he retains as such without administration, and if the wife is the survivor it applies to such of the community property as she receives by will or as her share of the estate.

5. Husband and wife $\S$ 274(1)—Property received by widow as allowance and fees properly distributed to her next of kin.

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1386, subd. 8, property which widow received from deceased husband's estate as family allowance and as fees as executrix on her death was properly distributed to her next of kin, and not to her husband's descendants.

6. Homestead $\S$ 142(2)—Next of kin of widow entitled to proceeds of homestead set aside to her.

Under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1386, subd. 8, next of kin of deceased widow, and not the descendants of her husband, held entitled to proceeds of homestead set aside to widow on husband's death; property having vested absolutely in her as survivor, and order setting it aside to her having been unnecessary.

7. Husband and wife — 274(1)—Property acquired by widow held not husband's descendants' as presumably community property.

Property acquired by widow after husband's death with funds, source of which was not traced, held not to go to husband's descendants on her death, as against her next of kin, on any ground funds must be presumed to be proceeds of community property; all in her hands not having been community property.

8. Husband and wife — 274(4) — Burden on heir whose right depends on fact of relationship, and fact property was formerly community property.

Where the right of a person as heir depends not merely on the fact of a certain relationship, but also on fact property he claims as heir had formerly been community property of decedent and predeceased spouse, or else separate property of latter, burden of proof as to such fact rests upon him.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Jane Simonton, deceased. From final decree of distribution, J. G. Simonton and others appeal. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

George W. Prince, Jr., Overton, Lyman & Plumb, and Wm. B. Himrod, all Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from the final decree of distribution of the estate of Jane Simonton, deceased. The decedent by her will, after making certain specific bequests, left the residue of her estate to her "heirs at law as provided by the laws of succession of the state of California." She was the widow of one George W. Simonton, and left no descendants of her own, but there survived her a son and a daughter of her husband by a former marriage and three children of a deceased son of her husband by that marriage. She also left blood relations of her own.

The statute of successions in this state (section 1386, Civ. Code) provides, in brief (subdivision 8), that when a widow dies intestate and without issue such of her estate as was formerly either the community property of herself and husband or his separate property shall go to the descendants of her husband, if any there be, and the balance of her estate shall go to her next of kin by blood. In the present instance, upon the presentation of the petition for distribution, issue was made between the descendants of Mr. Simonton and the next of kin of Mrs. Simonton as to what portion of her estate had been formerly community property and should therefore go to Mr. Simonton's descendants, and as to what portion was not of this character and should therefore go to Mrs. Simonton's branch of the family. There was no contention that any portion of the estate had been formerly Mr. Simonton's separate estate. The probate court proceeded to determine the issue so made, found that a certain portion of the estate had been formerly community property and that a very considerable portion had not, and decreed distribution accordingly. From this result the descendants of Mr. Simonton, with the exception of his daughter, appeal, claiming that as to certain property found not to have been formerly community property the finding of the court is not sustained by the evidence.

The property as to which the finding of the probate court is attacked by the appellants falls into four classes: First, property which stood in Mrs. Simonton's name at the time of her husband's death and was not inventoried or accounted for as a part of his estate, but which the appellants claim was nevertheless community property; second, property received by Mrs. Simonton from her husband's estate by way of family allowance as his widow and by way of fees as his executrix; third, property which is the proceeds of certain real property, claimed by appellants to have been community property, which had been selected as a homestead by Mrs. Simonton and her husband while both were living and was set aside to her as such in the administration of his estate; and, fourth, certain property purchased by her after her husband's death with funds the source of which is not traced.

[1] As to the first class of property, that in Mrs. Simonton's name at the time of her husband's death and which was not inventoried or accounted for as a part of his estate, a complete answer to the appellant's contention is that the question is now concluded by the settlement of Mrs. Simonton's account as an executrix of her husband's will. As one of his personal representatives it was her duty to inventory and account in the administration of his estate for all of his property, either common or separate, in her possession, or of which she had knowledge. In particular, if the property here in question was common property as is now claimed, it was her duty to inventory and account for it. The appellants, on the other hand, were legatees under his will and the amount of their legacies depended directly upon the amount of the estate, so that they were directly interested in the executrix including in her inventory and account everything forming part of the estate. Under these circumstances the presentation of Mrs. Simonton's account as executrix and the petition for its settlement presented as between her and the appellants the question as to what property in her hands was part of the estate, and the settlement of her account of necessity involved a determination of this question. Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269; Stevens v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 148, 99 Pac. 512.

[2, 3] The order of settlement, when it became final, was as between her and those beneficially interested in the estate conclusive upon her as to the ownership of any property for which she was held accountable. Estate of Burdick, 112 Cal. 387, 44 Pac. 734. Conversely, it was conclusive upon those beneficially interested as to any property for which she was not held accountable and which she did not withhold from her accounts fraudulently or by mistake. Tobelman v. Hildebrandt, 72 Cal. 313, 14 Pac. 20; Lataillade v. Orena, 91 Cal. 579, 27 Pac. 924, 25 Am. St. Rep. 219; Estate of Grant, 131 Cal. 429, 63 Pac. 731; Silva v. Santos, 138 Cal. 536, 71 Pac. 703. There is no showing of any sort that in the present case Mrs. Simonton failed to account for the property in question through fraud or mistake. The settlement of her account being conclusive under these circumstances as between the appellants and herself, it is likewise conclusive as between the appellants and her successors in interest, the respondents. Section 1960, Code Civ. Proc. It follows that the probate court properly found that the property which stood in Mrs. Simonton's name and of which she had possession at the time of her husband's death and which she did not account for as a part of his estate was not community property.

As to the second class of property in dispute, property acquired by Mrs. Simonton from her husband's estate by way of family allowance as his widow and fees as his executrix, the question is determined by a proper construction of the Code section. The material provision of the Code (section 1386, subd. 8) reads:

"If the deceased is a widow * * * and leaves no issue, and the estate or any portion thereof, was common property of such decedent and * * * her deceased spouse, while such spouse was living, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse," etc.

Literally, this would include any property which had once been community property, no matter if it were not such at the time of the husband's death, as, for example, where the husband had in his lifetime given it to his wife for her separate property. But such a meaning is clearly not what was intended, and it has already been held that it is not the true meaning. Estate of McCauley, 138 Cal. 546, 71 Pac. 458.

[4] The only rational construction which can be given the provision is that it applies only to community property received by will or inheritance or retained by virtue of its character as community property. If the husband be the survivor, it applies to the community property which, as such, he retains without administration. If the wife be the survivor it applies to such of the community property as she receives either by will or as her share of the estate. This, and this alone, is undoubtedly what was in the mind of the Legislature when it adopted these provisions whereby those who are not the relatives of a decedent are yet made heirs by reason of their relationship to a predeceased spouse of the decedent.

The correctness of this construction is made doubly evident by the language of the second paragraph of the Code subdivision, that which deals with property which was the separate property of the predeceased spouse. There the language is that such property as "came to the decedent (the surviving spouse) by descent, devise or bequest" from the spouse first dying shall go to the latter's relatives. This language is specific as to how the property must come to the decedent in order that the provision apply. The equivalent provision in the case of community property would be one limited to property received or retained by the survivor of the community either by will or by inheritance or by virtue of its character as community property. There is a fair presumption that upon this point the provisions with regard to community and separate property were intended to be equivalent, for no reason for a difference exists. Furthermore, to place a broader construction upon the provision in regard to community property than the language of the provision in regard to separate property will permit as to it would be to place the relatives of a predeceased spouse in a more favorable position with regard to community property than with regard to such spouse's separate property, when, if any distinction were to be made, it would naturally be just the contrary. In this connection it may perhaps be worthy of note that in another respect, that of the matter of division between the two sets of relatives, a distinction is made between separate and community property, and that the distinction, as is natural, is in favor of the relatives of the predeceased spouse as to property which was his or her separate property. The Code subdivision provides that if neither spouse leave descendants the separate property of the spouse first dying shall go to his or her relatives exclusively, while the community property shall be divided between the relatives of both spouses.

[5] Our conclusion, as stated, is that the Code provision refers only to community property which the surviving spouse received by will or inheritance or retained by virtue of its character as community property. The property which Mrs. Simonton received as family allowance and as fees as executrix was not received by her in any of these ways, and it follows that the probate court properly distributed it to her next of kin exclusively.

[6] What has just been said is likewise determinative of the question as to the third class of property in dispute, that which is the proceeds of the homestead set aside to Mrs. Simonton. Admitting the appellants' contention, which is very doubtful, that the property, when homesteaded, was community property, it was yet impressed with the homestead while both Mrs. Simonton and her husband were alive. It is familiar learning that under these circumstances the property vested upon Mr. Simonton's death absolutely in Mrs. Simonton as the survivor, and this not by way of inheritance or as in any way a part of her husband's estate. The order made in the course of the administration of his estate setting the property aside to her was wholly unnecessary and ineffective. Hart v. Taber, 161 Cal. 20, 118 Pac. 252, and authorities there cited. Practically the identical question here presented was presented in Estate of Beer, 178 Cal. 54, 171 Pac. 1062, where it was decided that the relatives of a predeceased spouse were not the heirs of the surviving spouse as to property which had been homesteaded and which came to the surviving spouse by virtue of the homestead. The only difference between it and the present case is that there the homestead was selected by the predeceased spouse out of her own separate estate, while here it was selected out of community property. But the difference is immaterial, since the right of the surviving spouse in the two cases is identical. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the appellants are not entitled to any portion of the proceeds of the homestead property.

[7, 8] As to the fourth class of property, that acquired by Mrs. Simonton after her husband's death with funds the source of which was not traced, the argument of appellants' counsel would seem to be that such funds must be presumed to be the proceeds of community property, since, according to their contention, practically all the property she had was community property. But since, as we have just held, a very substantial portion of her property was not community property, his argument fails. Furthermore, where the right of a person as heir depends not merely upon the fact of a certain relationship, but upon the fact of such relationship plus the fact that the property he claims as heir had formerly been either the community property of the decedent and his or her predeceased spouse or else the separate property of the latter, the burden of proof of showing such additional fact rests upon him. It is a fact which must appear in order that he be an heir and he is an heir only as to property as to which it does appear. It is an essential element of his claim of heirship and he must affirmatively show it, just as in the ordinary case, where heirship depends entirely upon relationship, the burden rests upon the claimant of proving the relationship which makes him an heir. In the present case the fact that the source of the funds with which Mrs. Simonton purchased certain property after her husband's death is not traced means that as to this property the appellants' claim of heirship was not made out. It follows that the property was properly distributed to the respondents who are heirs by virtue of their relationship alone.

The claim is also made on behalf of the appellants that the income received during administration from the portion of the estate which was determined by the probate court to be theirs was not distributed to them, but included in the cash distributed to the respondents. Of this claim respondents' counsel in their brief make what is apparently a complete refutation, and nothing in rebuttal appears in the appellants' reply brief. Under these circumstances we do not feel compelled to inquire ourselves into the correctness of the refutation, but will assume it.

Decree affirmed.

(L. A. 5309.)

1. Election of remedies §3(1) — Rescission held not barred.

Notwithstanding a party induced to enter into a transaction by fraud affirms it by an action for damages and loses the right to disaffirm subsequently, may, when sued on the contract, defend by counterclaim, and cross-complaint, filed at the same time, and say that he is entitled either to damages or to rescission, and that if he cannot have the latter he asks the former, without barring his right to disaffirm.

2. Landlord and tenant §34(1) — Lessee's rights to rescission lost by transfer of rentals and subleases to his wife.

If lessee, who was induced to execute a lease by fraud, previous to commencement of an action for rent, in which he sought rescission, actually transferred rentals and subleases to his wife, he alone could not rescind.

3. Landlord and tenant §34(2) — Lessee cannot rescind because false representations as to previous lease prevented building.

Lessee cannot rescind on the ground that false representations as to a previous lease for a part of premises prevented his construction of a building, requiring the execution of a new lease between the parties not made, since such injury could not be predicated on the existing lease.

4. Landlord and tenant ⚡34(4)—Lessee must rescind promptly after discovering facts putting him on inquiry as to his rights.

Though Civ. Code, § 1691, provides that to rescind the party entitled "must rescind promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he * * * is aware of his right to rescind," a lessee is not justified in waiting 2½ years after discovering the facts, reasonably putting him on inquiry leading to discovery of ground for rescission, since he is chargeable with knowledge of his rights as of the time when he discovered such facts.

5. Contracts ⚡270(1)—Knowledge of right to rescind is imputed at time person is charged with discovery of facts.

The rule as to the time as of which a person seeking rescission will be charged with knowledge of his right is the same as in regard to the time as of which he will be charged with the discovery of facts which give him the right.

6. Landlord and tenant ⚡34(4)—Failure of lessee to learn of legal right to rescind held due to want of diligence.

In absence of explanation, lessee's failure to learn of his legal right to rescind for 2½ years after discovery of fraud affording ground therefor must be held due to his want of diligence.

7. Landlord and tenant ⚡31—Lessee held to have lost his right to rescind for fraud by dealing with property as if contract in effect.

Where lessee, after discovering facts warranting a rescission for fraud, dealt with the property as if the contract was still in effect, and subleased and collected rents even after filing a cross-complaint for rescission in a suit for rent, he must be held to have unequivocally affirmed the lease, and cannot rescind.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Wm. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Paul Bancroft and another against Henry T. Woodward, with cross-complaint against the named plaintiff and others, seeking rescission of lease. Trial upon issues presented by cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant, declaring lease rescinded, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellants.

Wright, Winnek & McKee, of San Diego, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The plaintiffs brought an action to recover certain installments of rent due them from the defendant according to the terms of a lease between the parties. The defendant answered, denying certain of the allegations of the complaint and, in addition, alleging that he had been induced to execute the lease through a certain fraudulent misrepresentation by one of the plaintiffs. He also, in his answer, set up by way of counterclaim the same fraud and his damage thereby in a very considerable amount. He also filed at the same time a cross-complaint in which he sought a rescission of the lease by reason of the same fraud. The plaintiffs answered the cross-complaint and upon the issues presented by it and the answer to it, the cause went to trial, a trial of the issues presented by the original complaint and the defendant's answer being postponed. The trial resulted in a judgment for the defendant declaring the lease rescinded, and the plaintiffs appeal.

[1] It is well, before proceeding with a further statement of the facts, to dispose of a contention of the appellants based on the facts already stated. It is urged on their behalf that a person induced by fraud to enter into a contract has his option upon the discovery of the fraud either to allow the contract to stand and obtain relief in damages for the wrong inflicted upon him or to disaffirm the contract and obtain what relief is necessary to restore him to his original position, but that he cannot both recover damages and be restored to statu quo; that the right of a party defrauded to disaffirm the contract and be restored to his original position is one which must be affirmatively exercised and consistently maintained and which is lost if he takes a position inconsistent with it as where he brings an action for damages. From these propositions as a premise, the conclusion is argued that the defendant here cannot at the same time seek the relief of damages by way of counterclaim and claim rescission by way of his cross-complaint, and that because he does ask for damages he cannot have rescission.

We may grant the premise, but the conclusion does not follow. While it is true that a party induced to enter into a transaction by fraud affirms the transaction when he brings an action for damages, and because of the affirmation loses any right to disaffirm subsequently (Stuart v. Hayden, 169 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 274, 42 L. Ed. 639), it is not true that if he seeks to disaffirm, but ineffectually, he loses the right thereafter to maintain an action for damages. The right to damages exists unless and until the transaction is effectually disaffirmed. It could hardly be questioned, for example, that under a complaint which, by proper and sufficient averments, set out that the plaintiff had been induced by fraud to enter into a contract and had endeavored to rescind it because of such fraud, and prayed relief upon the basis of a rescission, the plaintiff might be accorded damages in case the fraud were found but under such circumstances that the right of rescission did not exist. To put the matter in another way, it is wholly inconsistent for a party defrauded to ask for damages first and a rescission if he cannot have them. But there is nothing inconsistent in his asking for rescission first and damages if he cannot have it. The defendant here by his counterclaim and cross-complaint, filed at the same time, has gone no further than to say that he is entitled either to damages or to rescission, and that if he cannot have the latter he asks the former. There is nothing in this that constitutes an affirmance so that his right to rescission is gone. Upon this point the case comes directly within the rulings of Glover v. Radford, 120 Mich. 542, 79 N. W. 803, and Richardson v. Lowe, 149 Fed. 625, 79 C. C. A. 317.

[2] Passing now to the further facts, much of what we are about to state is not in dispute. As to some of the facts, however, this is not true, and wherever it is not we have taken either the facts as found by the court or the defendant's own testimony upon which his case almost entirely depends. It appears that the plaintiffs were and are the owners of an entire block in the business district of San Diego, which, on October 7, 1912, they leased as a whole to the defendant for a period of 99 years, commencing the 1st of the following January, 1913. It is this lease for whose rentals the plaintiffs sued and whose rescission is sought by the defendant. The block was occupied by a number of different buildings leased, in whole or in part, to various tenants for various periods. The lease to the defendant, which we may call the ground lease, provided that it was subject to existing leases, and that the lessee should have the rents accruing from them after the commencement of his term, and should himself have the right to make leases. The negotiations for the lease were carried on by the defendant mainly with one of the plaintiffs, and during the negotiations this plaintiff handed the defendant a bundle of papers, and told him that it contained all of the outstanding leases, when, in fact, it did not contain one to a Mrs. Kinney, of which the defendant remained ignorant until after he had taken possession under his lease. The Kinney lease was of the upper floor of a two-story building occupying one-eighth of the block at the northwest corner. The floor leased was used as a rooming house. Mrs. Kinney was in possession at the time, but under another lease, of which the defendant was informed and which expired December 31, 1913. The lease complained of was an extension of this at an increased rental for three years, expiring December 31, 1916. Complaint is not made by the defendant as to the rental called for by the latter lease, but solely as to the length of its term. The lease to the defendant contemplated, and, in fact required, that the defendant erect new buildings on the property, and this was a feature of the negotiations between him and the plaintiffs. His complaint is that because of the length of the term of the Kinney lease negotiations which he had under way for financing the improving of the property failed, and he was unable to improve it as he desired.

The defendant's agent discovered the existence of the second Kinney lease almost immediately on taking charge of the property, and the defendant himself learned of it by the 1st of the following April, three months after the commencement of his term. He immediately complained to the plaintiff who had made the representation as to existing leases, who stated that he had forgotten about the extension, and would do all he could to get Mrs. Kinney out by the end of 1913, when the defendant had expected to be free to take possession. Nothing more occurred concerning the matter until some months later, and still in 1913, the defendant spoke to the plaintiff again about it. The plaintiff then told him that the lease to Mrs. Kinney was good, and he was unable to put her out, and expressed regret, and assured the defendant he would do all he could to rectify the mistake, presumably in the way of making some allowance to the defendant.

In the meantime the defendant had been going ahead with his negotiations for financing the construction of new buildings or rather a new building. The ground lease itself required the erection by the end of 1921 of buildings costing at least $200,000. It also provided that the building on the west half of the block, where the building occupied in part by Mrs. Kinney was located, should be of "Class A" construction, without similar provision as to the east half, and that no buildings should be torn down except those on the north half of the east half until at least $50,000 had been expended in new buildings on the last-mentioned portion. It must be taken that what the parties had in mind when they made the lease conformed with these provisions and the materiality of the misrepresentation must be judged by reference to them. Even these buildings the defendant had at no time the means to construct, although he could have obtained the money for a $50,000 building on the portion of the block to be first improved and which was not affected by the Kinney lease.

But the building whose construction the defendant was endeavoring to finance was of a much more ambitious character. It was to be a hotel known as the Royal Alexandria, which would cost $900,000 or more. It was the negotiations for financing the erection of this building which it is complained failed because of the Kinney lease. These negotiations were along the line of organizing a hotel company, which was to take the ground lease, the issuing by it of $2,000,000 in bonds, which, through the intervention of another company, were to be underwritten by still a third and disposed of by it abroad. The scheme, however, involved the plaintiffs' modifying the terms of the ground lease. As it read, it provided for specified annual rentals for the first 10 years of the lease, and that thereafter the rental was to be 5 per cent. net on the value of the ground, as ascertained by appraisal immediately prior to the commencement of each 10-year period. The persons with whom the defendant was negotiating desired that the lease provide a fixed rental for the first 30 years of the term, and drafts of an agreement and new lease so providing were actually prepared, but were never signed. In other words, the success of the negotiations which it is claimed failed because of the existence of the Kinney lease and because of whose failure it is now sought to rescind the ground lease involved the obtaining by the defendant of the consent of the plaintiffs themselves to a modification of the ground lease, something which they were not obligated to give and did not give. On the other hand, the fact, according to the defendant's testimony, which must be taken to be true, is that the plaintiffs were ready to consent, and that the negotiations did not fail because of any unwillingness on their part in this respect.

The defendant's negotiations to finance the new building came to an end about September, 1913, while Mrs. Kinney was still in possession under her first lease of which the defendant was informed when he made the ground lease and which still had several months to run. The negotiations were never resumed. From time to time thereafter the defendant had conversations with the plaintiff who had made the false representation complained of. The two men saw each other frequently, but there was no suggestion of a rescission or cancellation of the lease, or that the defendant was not obligated thereunder. He informed the plaintiffs that the negotiations had failed because of the Kinney lease, and the plaintiff replied that he would use his best efforts with the other plaintiffs to obtain a reduction of rent on account of it. Matters ran along in this way for practically two years, until August, 1915. In the meantime the salability and rental value of the property had substantially diminished. The defendant failed to pay the rent due that month, and after several conversations with the plaintiff about the matter had an interview with him in company with his lawyer. The defendant stated that he was anxious to carry on the lease, but could not do so at the agreed rental, and asked for a reduction which the plaintiff rejected as unreasonable in amount. The defendant then offered to cancel the lease, and the plaintiff replied that he would do what he could to obtain a reasonable reduction in rent from the other plaintiffs, but they would not take the property back. It was then agreed that the plaintiff would communicate with his fellow lessors about a reduction in rent. Whether he did so or not does not appear, but, in any event, the present action was shortly thereafter commenced against the defendant without further communication with him.

During all this time the defendant was in possession of the property, collecting the rents from the various tenants, himself extending old leases and making new ones and in every way exercising full dominion under the ground lease. It is alleged in the cross-complaint, testified to by the defendant and found by the court, that while he personally discovered the fraud claimed to have been perpetrated upon him by April 1, 1913, and thereafter proceeded under the lease and retained dominion of the property, he did not learn of his right to rescind the lease until September, 1915, shortly after the commencement of the plaintiffs' action against him. Then he consulted a lawyer, and was advised of his supposed right, and thereupon filed his answer and cross-complaint, alleging the fraud, that he was ignorant of his right to rescind until about September 1, 1915, and offering to restore everything of value he had received from the plaintiffs under the lease. Even after this, however, he retained dominion of the property, collected the rents, and actually made a lease of a portion of it.

We say the defendant collected the rents advisedly, although the fact is that just previous to the commencement of the action he had assigned the accruing rentals for 3 years to his wife, and she thereafter collected them. But if the fact be that this assignment was a genuine transfer of interest so that the rents collected by the defendant's wife were not in effect collected for him, it is evident that the defendant had put it out of his power to surrender the lease and its benefits without the concurrence of his wife, which was not shown. If this were the situation, he alone could not rescind. The most favorable view for the defendant is therefore that it was he who was the ultimate collector of the rents.

[3] Upon the foregoing facts we can see but little question but that for several reasons the defendant did not have the right to rescind. In the first place, it is not shown that the defendant was materially injured by the false representation complained of, and it is conceded that in such a case as the present this must appear. As we have said, no complaint is made as to the amount of the rental reserved by the Kinney lease. The sole complaint is that because of the length of its term the negotiations of the defendant for financing the erection of the hotel building failed. But those negotiations involved the plaintiffs' consent to a new and different lease. As a condition of giving it the plaintiffs would have had the right to require an acquiescence by the defendant in the Kinney lease. In fact, the new lease which the plaintiffs were apparently ready to sign did so provide, for it provided that it was subject to existing leases of which the Kinney lease was at that time known to be one. The situation is that the arrangement, the failure to consummate which is relied upon by the defendant as the injury done him by the plaintiffs through their false representation, was an arrangement which he was not entitled to make, and could not make except by the consent of the plaintiffs themselves, which they were not obligated to give. The defendant could complain of the wrong of the plaintiffs in case it worked injury to him in respect to some right which he had, not in respect to something to which he had no right unless the plaintiffs themselves agreed to it. The defendant could perhaps have complained if the false representation had interfered with negotiations, which would otherwise have been successful, for the construction of a building or buildings under his lease as he had it. But he cannot complain of the interference with negotiations for erecting a building under a lease which he did not have, and that is the only complaint made. The fact that the plaintiffs were willing to agree to such a lease is wholly immaterial. If they did agree, the defendant of necessity acquiesced in the Kinney lease. If they did not agree, the negotiations of the defendant were futile. In any case, the object of the negotiations, the failure to achieve which is alone complained of, was something which the defendant could not do under the lease which he had, and his right to rescind must depend upon his suffering loss under that lease.

[4] In the second place, there is no sufficient excuse presented for the defendant waiting 2½ years after discovering the fraud before endeavoring to rescind. It is true that the Code provides (section 1691, Civ. Code) that to accomplish a rescission the party entitled thereto "must rescind promptly upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, if he * * * is aware of his right to rescind." It is true likewise that the complaint alleges and the court finds that the defendant was not aware of his right to rescind until just prior to the filing of his cross-complaint. But no reason whatever is stated in the cross-complaint, and no sufficient reason appears in the evidence or findings why he did not long before become aware of his right, assuming that he had one. It is well settled that where a party has knowledge of facts of a character which would reasonably put him upon inquiry, and such inquiry, if pursued, would have led to a discovery of the fraud or other ground for rescission, he will be charged with having discovered the fraud or other ground as of the time he should have discovered it; that is, as of the time when he would have discovered it if he had with reasonable diligence pursued the inquiry when he should have done so. Lady Washington, etc., Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 Pac. 809; Harrington v. Patterson, 124 Cal. 542, 57 Pac. 476.

[5] The reason for this rule is that diligence throughout is required of one who would rescind. It is a reason which applies with equal, if not greater, force to the time at which such a person, after learning of the facts upon which his right is based, will be held to be aware of their legal consequence, his right to rescind. It is at least intimated in Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 679, 53 Pac. 304, and Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 153, 112 Pac. 1094, that the rule is the same in regard to the time as of which a person seeking rescission will be charged with knowledge of his right as it is in regard to the time as of which he will be charged with a discovery of the facts which give him the right, and the reason for this is so plain that we have no hesitation in declaring it to be the case.

[6] Applying this rule to the present case it appears that the defendant admittedly learned of the fraud which he claims was perpetrated upon him by April 1, 1913, and knew of the injury which he claims resulted therefrom by September, 1913. It is claimed, however, that he did not actually become aware of his legal right to rescind because of the fraud until September 1, 1915. In the absence of any explanation the permitting of this lapse of time before learning of his legal rights is wholly unreasonable. Fraud is no slight matter. Where, as here, a party claims to have been defrauded and to have been injured thereby very substantially any reasonable diligence at all would require of him that he proceed promptly to ascertain what his rights were. When he waits 2 years after learning both of the fraud and of his injury before making any attempt to do this there are but two conclusions which can be drawn from his delay in the absence of explanation. Either he was guilty of a complete lack of diligence, or the fraud and injury complained of were not important in his mind and were not in fact substantial.

No explanation whatever of the defendant's delay is attempted in the cross-complaint, and it was demurrable for that reason. Nor does the evidence show any explanation, or at least any sufficient explanation. It may be that upon his first discovery of the fraud in the spring of 1913, the defendant was justified in not seeking to learn what his rights were, because of the statement of the plaintiff with whom he dealt that he would endeavor to get Mrs. Kinney out by the end of the year. But in the fall of 1913 this plaintiff told the defendant that the Kinney lease was good, and that he could not get Mrs. Kinney out. At just about the same time the defendant's negotiations for financing failed, so that he then knew both of the fraud and the supposed injury done him by it. Then certainly, if he were to act with reasonable diligence, he should have proceeded to ascertain what his rights were because of the wrong and injury done him. Instead he made from time to time requests for reduction of rent, which the plaintiff with whom he dealt would agree to take up with the other lessors but which were never agreed to. The defendant's own testimony would seem to make it pretty plain that a reduction was asked for not so much as a matter of right as it was as a matter of something which the plaintiffs should allow in fairness. But, however this may be, the only explanation for the delay of 2 years is these requests from time to time for a reduction in rent and the statement of one of the plaintiffs that he would endeavor to obtain one for the defendant. It certainly cannot be said that such conduct for such a length of time evidences the diligence which might reasonably be expected of a man defrauded and substantially injured.

The defendant in this connection relies upon the authority of Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 112 Pac. 1094. There the plaintiff and defendant had made a lease in mutual ignorance of a fact which rendered the lease practically valueless to the plaintiff, the lessee. The plaintiff discovered the mistake shortly afterwards in July, 1906. He at once protested to the agents of the defendant against going on with the lease, but was told the defendant was East and would shortly return, and he permitted the matter to remain in abeyance until the defendant's return. The defendant did not return until January, when the plaintiff immediately took the matter up with him, negotiating for a new lease which would obviate the result of the mistake. The negotiations lasted for about a month, the plaintiff asking that a new lease be given him or he be released. Upon the negotiations coming to an end the plaintiff immediately consulted a lawyer, was advised of his right to rescind, and at once gave notice of rescission. It was held that upon these facts a want of diligence on the part of the plaintiff did not appear.

That these facts, however, differ essentially from those of the case at bar is plain. In both cases the injured party was justified in first endeavoring by negotiation to see if the matter could not be satisfactorily arranged before inquiring as to his legal rights. But in the one case he took up and pushed the negotiations with diligence, insisting upon the matter being arranged. In the other case, the present one, he was satisfied to allow the matter to drift for 2 years upon conversations from time to time with one of the lessors, largely of a casual character, in which he would ask for a reduction of rent, and the lessor would reply that he would endeavor to get the other lessors to grant a reduction, and which never came to anything. Certainly, reasonable diligence required of him, the defendant here, that when after a reasonable time his negotiations with the plaintiffs, if his conversations can be considered as really amounting to negotiations, resulted in nothing, he should have acted if he had been really defrauded and substantially injured. This he did not do. If he had acted, the first step he would naturally have taken would have been to ascertain what his legal rights were and what redress he could obtain. We see no escape from the conclusion that the defendant's failure to learn of his right to rescind long before he did was due to his own want of diligence. This being the case, his right to rescind was lost.

[7] In the third place, the defendant's right to rescind, if he had any, was lost by his dealings with the property. The rule is too familiar to require the citation of authority that if a person entitled to rescind goes on, after he discovers the facts which give him the right and knows that he has the right, to deal with the property involved as if the contract or transaction were still in effect, he affirms the contract or transaction, and his right to rescind it is gone. That is exactly what the defendant here did. We need not go back to the time at which he should have known of his right to rescind but did not. It is necessary to consider only what he did after he filed his cross-complaint, when he was fully aware of his rights and was affirmatively seeking rescission. After this time he continued through the medium of his wife to collect the rents of the property, and in December, 1915 (the cross-complaint was filed in October, 1915), actually made a lease of a portion of the property for the term of 1 year, commencing the 1st of the following January, and granted an extension for the same period of another lease about to expire. He had no right to make either the new lease or the extension of the existing one, except under and by virtue of the ground lease which he was seeking to rescind. His action in doing so was alone an unequivocal affirmation of the latter, and as such destroyed whatever right of rescission he might previously have had.

It is true the trial court finds that all leases and extensions of leases made by the defendant were upon condition that the plaintiffs carry out what is found to be the promise of the plaintiffs that they would secure the removal of Mrs. Kinney or reduce the rent under the defendant's lease. In this connection it should be stated that no such condition was inserted in any of the leases or extensions made by the defendant. What is meant by this finding is that the defendant was acting upon a condition existing in his own mind. But even so, so far as any promise to remove Mrs. Kinney is concerned, the finding is without support except as to the first conversation, or conversations, in the spring of 1913 between the defendant and the plaintiff with whom he dealt. In the fall of that year, this plaintiff definitely informed the defendant that he could not get Mrs. Kinney out, and thereafter their conversations were upon that basis, and were confined to a discussion of a reduction of rental. Furthermore, the finding must be confined to the period prior to the filing of the cross-complaint. It can have no application to anything occurring subsequently, since at that time the plaintiffs in the most positive way possible, by the commencement of their action, had already informed the defendant that they would insist on the rental called for by the lease without reduction. The defendant's action thereafter in making the lease and extension mentioned could be nothing but what we have termed it, an unequivocal affirmance of the ground lease.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.

183 Cal. 112

THOMPSON et ux. v. MODERN SCHOOL OF BUSINESS AND CORRESPONDENCE.
(L. A. 5299.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 735—Former judgment not adjudication of question not in issue.

Former default judgment in favor of correspondence school against salesman for courses or scholarships claimed to have been purchased by him was not adjudication whether or not school had been guilty of deceit on him and his wife, now suing therefor; such question not being in issue.

2. Fraud $\S$ 31—Right to rescind contract or perform and recover damages.

Where one is induced to contract by deceit, he may, on discovery, repudiate and rescind, or may allow contract to stand and perform his part, and yet recover any damages, except so far as his own performance waives them.

3. Fraud $\S$ 58(1)—Evidence held to show fraudulent scheme of correspondence school.

In an action for damages for fraud against a school by one induced to contract with it as a salesman of scholarships and by his wife, who became surety for him, evidence held sufficient to justify finding school's whole scheme was founded in fraud of which plaintiffs were victims.

4. Fraud $\S$ 61—Exemplary damages recoverable.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1709, 3294, a scholarship salesman for a school, induced to enter its employment through fraud, and his wife, who became his surety likewise under fraudulent representations, could recover actual as well as exemplary damages, though compensation of salesman was fixed by contract.

5. Fraud $\S$ 54—Evidence held admissible to show scienter.

In an action for fraud against a school by a scholarship salesman and his wife, his surety, evidence of other persons who had contracted with the school, tending to show its business of employing salesmen was fraudulently conducted, held admissible to show scienter and to lay foundation for exemplary damages.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by William L. Thompson and Laura P. Thompson, his wife, against the Modern School of Business and Correspondence. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant.

Harrison G. Sloane, of San Diego, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, William L. Thompson, and his wife, Laura P. Thompson in an action for damages based on fraud—for actual damages to plaintiff William L. Thompson in the sum of $235, for "community damage" in the amount of $2,500, and for exemplary damages in the same sum for him and his wife. The court made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and entered judgment for actual damages to William L. Thompson in the amount of $230 and for joint damages in the sum of $460.

The defendant, the Modern School of Business and Correspondence, is a corporation organized under the laws of this state and claiming to have its principal place of business in San Francisco. This is the way the organization was held out to the public: It was represented in an "annual catalogue" that headquarters were maintained in a pretentious building in San Francisco, where there was a "faculty," composed of thirteen "heads of departments." Besides this "faculty," there was a "superintendent of organizers," whose business, it appears, was to induce others to enter the school's employ as "field organizers." These "field organizers" were designated to solicit persons to become "students" in the school and to purchase "courses of instruction"; the instruction to be given through the United States mails. It seems that, according to the scheme, the purchaser of a "course of instruction" could pay in cash or in monthly installments, and was entitled to receive from the school "syllabi, summaries, suggestive outlines, and helps in study," and upon the successful completion of the course there would be conferred upon the "student" a "handsome diploma." It was also represented in the catalogue that there was a "regular employment department to assist graduates of the school in securing desirable positions." The prices charged for the "courses of instruction" did not appear in the catalogue.

Thompson, having read in San Diego a newspaper advertisement of the school, addressed a letter to the headquarters, asking for information. The school replied, under date of June 3, 1915, that if Thompson were selected he would be engaged "on a guaranteed salary, based on education and previous business experience." Thompson filled out and forwarded the application blank which had been sent to him. In a letter dated June 8 the school informed Thompson that its "superintendent of organizers," Mr. Joseph H. Hill, would call on him in San Diego, and stating, "We are authorizing him to engage you on a guaranteed salary of $900 for the first year." In the interview that followed between Hill and Thompson on June 20 in San Diego, Hill told Thompson that he would be required to make a deposit of $10, which was, according to the latter's testimony, "returnable on the first sale." Thompson further stated that Hill told him that this deposit was "to cover the possible chance that I might not enter on the duties after he had spent his time educating me." Thompson was also required to furnish security—or, as Hill put it, a "credit blank" or "bonds"—for the faithful accounting of any collections from "students" which he might make on behalf of the school. Thompson paid the $10 deposit and "gave the name of my wife, Laura P. Thompson, as my security." Hill outlined to Thompson the duties of a "field organizer." On June 21 Thompson entered into a written contract of employment with the school, through Hill, under the terms of which Thompson agreed to devote his entire time to the work of "field organizer" for a period of one year. The contract was admitted in evidence and the provision for compensation was as follows:

"(11) If after this contract has been completed by the said party of the first part [Thompson] it be found that his profits on enrollments secured during the period of this contract, as shown by his own daily reports sent to said school, have not amounted to nine hundred dollars ($900.00) then said second party [school] agrees to make up in cash such deficiency."

On the same day Mrs. Thompson executed and delivered the "credit blank" or "bond" binding herself to pay to the school at San Francisco such amount as should be stipulated and agreed to be paid by her husband "for goods, supplies, stationery, scholarships, and certificates of membership as he may have ordered, or may hereafter order from time to time, not exceeding $250 in any one shipment." Thompson explained that he had his wife do this upon the representation of Hill that "it is simply a guaranty that, if you collect moneys for the company and you fail to return them, that Mrs. Thompson, or whoever signs this letter of credit, will make restitution." Thompson further testified:

That on the same date Hill presented to him an "order blank" to be used in ordering courses from the school and "at the time that he produced this * * * he brought up and mentioned the samples, * * * and he then produced this blank with two courses, the Commercial Scholarship and the Civil Service Scholarship, on it. I had, of course, been studying for several days prior to this under Mr. Hill, * * * and I had become very much pleased with their automobile engineering course, * * * and I told Mr. Hill that I thought I ought to have a sample of that course as well, * * * and so he said, 'All right, we will include that.' And that auto engineering course was then added. After that * * * he handed this order over to me, and I also signed this."

According to Thompson, Hill also told him that these scholarships were "to be used for demonstrating the course. * * *" On cross-examination he testified further as to this conversation with Hill:

"I said, '* * * These scholarships are to be paid for, whether sold or not,' and he said, 'No; that is referring to the matter of collecting the money.'"

It is alleged in the complaint, and evidence was admitted in support of the allegation, that the "order blank" was changed after Thompson had signed and delivered it to Hill. As introduced in evidence there appear thereon, opposite the designations "Commercial Scholarships," "Civil Service Scholarships," and "Auto Eng. Scholarships," the amounts "$27.00," "$23.00," and "$31.00," respectively; the sum "$81.00" appears as the total "amount"; opposite the words "Total amount which I am to pay for above order" is the sum "$81"; opposite the words "Total credits due me" the sum "$10.00" (being apparently the deposit made by Thompson); and opposite the words "Balance to be charged to my account" the amount "$71.00." Thompson's testimony in respect to this instrument was: "There were no figures on the paper at the time I signed it."

Hill did not appear at the trial, but in his deposition he testified that the "order blank" was entirely filled out, including the figures for the prices of supplies ordered, before Thompson signed it; that he never told Thompson, or gave him to understand, that the scholarships were for demonstrating, or were not to be paid for; that "the prices inserted in the order blank were written therein with the full knowledge and consent of the said W. L. Thompson"; and that he made no change or alteration in the figures or prices in the "order blank" after Thompson had signed it.

According to the evidence, the "courses" or "scholarships" were all delivered to and accepted by Thompson, who testified that subsequently he worked faithfully for a period of 80 days trying to sell the "scholarships," but that he was unable to make a sale, and he estimated that additional expenditures incurred necessarily in the course of the canvass amounted to $28.50. About September 21, 1915, he returned to the school the three courses which he had received. The school refused to accept them, and demanded that he pay the balance of $71, which, with the deposit of $10, made the total of $81. On September 29 Thompson wrote to the school, declining to pay for the courses and claiming that he was not aware that they were "unreturnable." After some correspondence suit was commenced against the plaintiffs by one A. S. Cohn, assignee of the school, in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, on February 24, 1916, to recover the balance of $71. The plaintiffs herein were defendants in that action, and judgment was entered against them by default. It was after the filing of the suit in the justice's court that the plaintiffs instituted this suit, alleging that the understanding between Thompson and Hill was that the scholarships were not to be paid for by him, but by the "students" who should buy them, and charging fraud in the insertion in the "order blank" of the figures for the price of each course or scholarship after Thompson's signature had been affixed thereto.

[1] 1. The first ground urged for a reversal of the judgment is stated in appellant's brief as follows:

"That plaintiff's amended and supplemental complaint admits the adjudication in the justice's court in San Francisco of all of the subject-matter herein pleaded, and by reason thereof this action is res judicata. * * * The defendants there and plaintiffs here had their remedy by counterclaim or any other defense. * * *"

The allegation of the complaint upon which appellant bases this statement is as follows:

"That thereafter, and on or about the 24th day of February, 1916, defendant transferred and assigned the said instruments and purported right of action thereon * * * to one A. S. Cohn. * * * That thereafter A. S. Cohn did file an action in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., against these plaintiffs, * * * and that the same was founded upon the instruments in writing secured from these plaintiffs, namely, the letter of credit or credit blank and the order blank above referred to, but that the same did not present for adjudication the contract of employment secured from these plaintiffs. * * * That thereafter A. S. Cohn on the 26th day of May, 1916, secured a judgment valid upon its face."

The answer to this contention is that the former judgment is not an adjudication of the question whether or not the defendant is guilty of deceit. The question was not put in issue in that action.

[2] Where one is induced by deceit to make a contract, he has a choice of remedies: (1) He may, upon discovery of the deceit, repudiate and rescind the contract; or (2) he may allow the contract to stand and perform his part thereof, and may, notwithstanding such performance, recover of the other party any damages he may have suffered by reason of the deceit, except in so far as his own performance may operate as a waiver of damage. Hence it follows that a judgment against him, given upon his default, in an action brought by the other party to enforce the contract, does not preclude him from recovering damages for the deceit.

2. Appellant's second contention is that—"There was no evidence of a conspiracy or scheme to extort money from plaintiffs by defendant. * * * The theory of plaintiffs' claim of damages seems to be that appellant, together with its agent, Hill, conceived a plot to entice plaintiff * * * into its employment; that the signing of the 'agreement, order blank, and credit blank,' required of respondents, was a part of the conspiracy."

In this connection it is claimed that finding III is not supported by the evidence. That finding reads as follows:

"That between the 30th day of May, 1915, and the 21st day of June, 1915, at San Diego, Cal., Jos. H. Hill as agent of said defendant solicited plaintiff William L. Thompson to enter into its employ as a field organizer in the county of San Diego, state of California. That in order to secure the consent of said plaintiff to such employment defendant made promises of payment to said plaintiff, and made promises for the furnishing of certain supplies and samples and report blanks, which promises were and each of them was made by the said defendant without any intention of performing the same and with the intent to deceive the said plaintiff and to induce him to enter the employ of defendant. That, except for the fraudulent statements and promises of said defendant, plaintiff would not have entered the employ of said defendant and would not have rendered the services or delivered the instruments or paid the moneys hereinafter set out."

The court further characterized in finding XI the actions of the defendant and its agent, Hill:

"That all of the dealings of defendant with said plaintiffs and each of them, and all the promises, representations, and demands made upon them and each of them, were with the premeditated purpose of defrauding each of said plaintiffs and of extorting money from each of them. That in all of such dealings, representations, and demands said defendant was and is guilty of oppression, fraud, and malice, and that each of the said plaintiffs suffered actual damage thereby. That the said dealings were followed by said defendant in a course of conduct generally and usually practiced by said defendant upon such persons as it succeeds in inducing to enter its employ and were in accordance with a premeditated purpose to defraud these plaintiffs. That such of the acts hereinbefore set out as were performed by defendant through its agents were performed within the scope of such agents' actual authority, and were performed with the knowledge and consent of said defendant, and that said defendant thereafter accepted the fruits thereof with full knowledge of all the attending circumstances."

The Civil Code provides:

"Sec. 1709. One who willfully deceives another with intent to induce him to alter his position to his injury or risk, is liable for any damage which he thereby suffers.

"Sec. 1710. A deceit, within the meaning of the last section, is: * * * 4. A promise made without any intention of performing it."

"Sec. 1574. Actual fraud is always a question of fact."

"Sec. 1572. Actual fraud, within the meaning of this chapter, consists in any of the following acts, committed by a party to the contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract: * * * 4. A promise made without any intention of performing it."

Does the evidence support the findings? There is the testimony of Thompson to the effect that, according to the representations of Hill, the "students"—and not Thompson—would be responsible for payment of the scholarships, and that no figures appeared in the "order blank" when Thompson signed it; in other words, that the "order blank" had been altered without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. It is clear, from the evidence already referred to, that the findings rest on the conclusion that the entire scheme, both in its conception and operation, was fraudulent. It is to be observed that the questions of fact whether the deposit of $10 was "returnable on the first sale," whether the "credit blank" or "bond" was a guaranty of the faithful remittance of collections from the "students" or was merely designed further to delude the prospective victims into the belief that the transaction was bona fide and regular, whether Hill represented to Thompson that the "scholarships" were to be paid for by Thompson or by the "students," whether the "order blank" was filled out when Thompson signed it or afterwards, and whether any "courses" ordered were returnable if they remained unsold, are all involved in conflict.

We must therefore assume that the court resolved the conflict on the side of the plaintiffs. And, in addition to the testimony already described, Paul E. Sloane and V. E.

Standard testified that about the same time they had dealings of a similar nature with the school through Hill. There is a striking similarity between their testimony and that of Thompson, as to the representations upon which they were induced to enter into a contract, to furnish a "credit blank" or "bond," and to sign an "order blank." Each of them also testified that the "order blank" which he had signed was subsequently filled in without his knowledge or consent, as was claimed in the case of plaintiff. The Sloane "order blank" was admitted in evidence. This showed that the figures opposite the scholarships were written in an ink of a different color from that used in writing the scholarships and in the signature of Sloane. It is significant that, according to the "credit blank," the payments were to be made in San Francisco, instead of San Diego, where Thompson resided.

[3] The court, too, may have inferred fraud from the fact that on the face of the catalogue appears the cut of a prominent business building in San Francisco under which cut is printed, "Home of the Modern School of Business and Correspondence, San Francisco, California, U. S. A.," in order, it would seem, to give the impression that the school occupied the entire structure. Manifestly, from all the evidence, the court could infer—and no doubt it did—that the whole scheme was founded in fraud, of which the plaintiffs were made victims.

[4] 3. Appellant's third point is that "there was no evidence of damages, either actual or exemplary, from which plaintiffs suffered by any acts of defendant," for the reason that the compensation to be paid to Thompson was fixed by contract. This is not an action on contract, but one for damages arising through fraud. We have already quoted section 1709 of the Civil Code. And section 3294 of the same Code provides:

"In an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, express or implied, the plaintiff, in addition to the actual damages, may recover damages for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendant."

[5] 4. The fourth contention of appellant is that "the court erred in admitting the testimony of Paul E. Sloane and V. E. Standard," already referred to. This testimony of independent acts was clearly responsive to the issue of fraud, first, to show scienter; and, second, to lay a foundation for exemplary damages. Kornblum v. Arthurs, 154 Cal. 246, 97 Pac. 420; Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 99 Pac. 172.

5. This contention is disposed of in the discussion of appellant's second point as to the sufficiency of the evidence.

6. Appellant's sixth claim of error is:

"That as to finding No. 5 there was no evidence to support that portion of said finding as follows: 'Said defendant agreed to pay to plaintiff for such services the sum of $900, and to supply him with certain supplies, samples and report blanks.'"

This point does not call for discussion, for the reason that the eleventh clause of the contract, which we have already quoted, and the evidence in reference thereto, would alone support the finding.

DOWNING v. CUTTING PACKING CO.
(S. F. 8767.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 1, 1920.)

1. Contracts $\S$ 318—Forfeiture should be restrained to technical limits.

Where the right to a forfeiture is created by contract or by law, it has always been considered it should be restrained to the most technical limits of the terms and conditions on which the right is to be exercised.

2. Landlord and tenant $\S$ 94(1) — Notice to quit held not to terminate tenancy for years, and guarantor may still be held liable.

Where plaintiff deposited a large sum of money to guarantee payment of rent by a tenant for years, and on default in payment of rent the landlord, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1161, subd. 2, served notice to quit or pay rent, the mere service of notice did not of itself terminate the tenancy, for, as shown by the following subdivision, the purpose of such notice is a forfeiture of the lease; hence, where the tenant failed to vacate the premises, and the landlord, waiving the notice despite plaintiff's protest, etc., collected the rent out of the deposit, plaintiff cannot recover the amount, on the theory a new tenancy was created by acts of the parties, for which he was not a guarantor.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by George Downing against the Cutting Packing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lloyd Baldwin and John F. Cassell, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Houghton & Houghton and Edward T. Houghton, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from the judgment. The material facts are as follows:

On October 31, 1914, Thomas W. Butcher leased to Ibos and Roche certain premises at the corner of Jackson and Drumm streets in San Francisco, for the term of five years, beginning December 1, 1914. The rental, after the first three months, was $500 a month, payable on the 1st day of each month, in advance. Thereafter in August, 1915, Butcher sold the premises to the Cutting Packing Company, subject to the lease. As a part of the consideration of this sale, the plaintiff, Downing, executed an agreement with the defendant in pursuance whereof the plaintiff deposited in the American National Bank the sum of $6,000, to be held by said bank for the purpose of securing the payment of the rents falling due thereafter from Ibos and Roche under said lease. The agreement provided that, if Ibos and Roche should make default in the payment of any monthly installment of rent, then "as often as payment of said installments of rent shall become in default the said American National Bank of San Francisco, upon the written demand of [Cutting Packing Company] shall pay to the said [Cutting Packing Company], out of the said moneys so deposited with it, the amount of the installment or installments of the rent so in default, until the whole of said sum of $6,000 is exhausted," and the said bank was thereby authorized and directed, upon receiving written notice that an installment of rent was due and unpaid, to pay to the Cutting Packing Company, out of said moneys, the installment so in default.

The installments falling due for October, November, and December, 1915, and January, 1916, were not paid by Ibos and Roche, but were paid by the said bank out of the fund deposited by Downing, as provided in said agreement. Because of this failure of Ibos and Roche, Downing became interested in obtaining a new tenant, and began negotiations with the Cutting Packing Company to that end. In pursuance of these negotiations, Downing procured one Webster as a prospective tenant, and an agreement in writing was proposed by the Cutting Packing Company to Webster, under which a lease of the premises was to be given to Webster as soon as the Cutting Packing Company could obtain possession thereof, either by the surrender of Ibos and Roche, or by proceedings to oust them under unlawful detainer proceedings. Webster proposed conditions to which the company would not agree and the negotiations ceased. The proposal, the counter proposal, and the rejection thereof all occurred on February 1, 1916.

Expecting that such agreement would be made, a notice from the company to Ibos and Roche to pay the rent or quit the premises was prepared by the attorney for the company for service. This notice was in the form required by subdivision 2 of section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It required Ibos and Roche to pay to the Cutting Packing Company, within 3 days after the service of the notice, the sum of $500, due as rent for the month of January, 1916, or to deliver the possession of the premises to said company, and stated that, unless they so paid said rent or delivered the possession, legal proceedings against them would be instituted for the recovery of possession. This notice was delivered by the attorney of the company on February 1 to a clerk in his office for service, and it was served on Ibos and Roche on February 2, 1916. The date for the payment of the rent therein demanded expired on February 5, 1916. The Cutting Packing Company then decided to abandon the proceedings for restitution of the premises, and on February 4 it demanded of the said bank the payment of $500, due for rent for January, and also the $500 which became due on February 1, for the rent of that month, and in pursuance of said agreement, authorizing and directing said bank on such demand to pay said rents, the said sum of $1,000 was paid by it to the Cutting Packing Company on February 4. It does not appear that Ibos and Roche were aware of this payment, or consented thereto; but they continued in possession of the premises. On February 5 Downing demanded of Cutting Packing Company that it immediately proceed to oust Ibos and Roche by unlawful detainer proceedings he made similar demands on February 26, 1916, and March 1, 1916. The company did not comply with these demands, but suffered the tenants to remain in possession, and demanded and received from the bank the rent for the months of March, April, May, and June, amounting to $2,000, out of the fund so deposited by Downing as aforesaid, notwithstanding the continued objections of Downing to its so doing. This action is for the recovery by plaintiff of the said sum of $2,000.

The case presents the question whether or not, after having given the notice of February 2, 1916, to pay rent or quit, the Cutting Packing Company had the lawful right to abandon further proceedings under said notice and collect the rents for subsequent months from the fund deposited by Downing as security therefor, notwithstanding the protest of Downing against its so doing. The respondent contends that the company could not withdraw or waive the notice to pay rent or abandon the proceeding to recover possession, and hold Downing liable as surety, without his consent. He states his position as follows:

"Where a valid notice to quit is given by a landlord to his tenant, the effect of such notice is to terminate the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties as of the date limited in the notice; that a notice to quit is a notice that cannot be withdrawn or done away with, at the option of the party giving it, and without the consent of both landlord and tenant, and, even if so withdrawn, a new tenancy is thereby created; consequently a guarantor of the rent under the original tenancy is not liable for rent which becomes due after the time the notice would have expired or actually did expire."

The appellant calls attention to the fact that there are two classes of notices to quit: First. Where the tenancy is from year to year, from month to month, or at will, or where a clause in the lease provides for a termination by notice. Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 1. Second. Where the law allows the landlord to terminate the lease, because of some default by the tenant in the performance of its conditions or covenants, by giving a notice to the tenant to perform within a specified time or deliver the possession. Id. subds. 2 and 3. Its claim is that the authorities relied on by the respondent relate exclusively to notices of the first class, that a different rule is applied in those of the second class, that in such cases there is a forfeiture of the remainder of the estate, which forfeiture occurs only when a second condition or act has supervened in connection with the notice, and that such a notice may be withdrawn, and the proceeding for forfeiture abandoned by the party giving the notice, without the act or consent of the party to whom it is given, provided the withdrawal occurs before the expiration of the time therein fixed for the forfeiture. His theory is that, when a notice to pay rent within three days or quit, as provided by section 1161, is served, no change in the legal relations between the parties takes place at that time or during that period, that the tenant may pay the rent within the time, in which case the lease continues in force unchanged, or he may allow the rent to remain unpaid and thus terminate the lease at the end of the 3-day period; but that if, while the time is running, the landlord elects to recall or waive the notice and abandon the proceeding for a forfeiture, he may do so, and the lease will continue in force thereafter.

[1, 2] The language of the section shows that the appellant's theory is correct. Subdivision 1 applies only to cases where the tenant holds over "after the expiration of the term for which it is let to him" and to tenancies at will which have been ended by a 30 days' notice. Civ. Code, § 789. This would, of course, include all tenancies of the first class above described. The provisions governing notices of the second class are set forth in subdivisions 2 and 3. Notices to pay rent or quit are provided for in subdivision 2 and by a part of subdivision 3 referring thereto. They are as follows:

"2. When he continues in possession * * * without the permission of his landlord, or the successor in estate of his landlord, if any there be, after default in the payment of rent, pursuant to the lease or agreement under which the property is held, and three days' notice, in writing, requiring its payment, stating the amount which is due, or possession of the property, shall have been served upon him and if there is a subtenant in actual occupation of the premises, also upon such subtenant."

"3. * * * Within three days after the service of such notice, the tenant, or any sub-tenant in actual occupation of the premises, or any mortgagee of the term, or other person interested in its continuance may perform the conditions or covenants of the lease or pay the stipulated rent, as the case may be, and thereby save the lease from forfeiture."

The language of the last clause of subdivision 3, above quoted, shows that the object to be attained by a notice under subdivisions 2 and 3 is a forfeiture of the lease. If the tenant, or other person interested, shall "pay the stipulated rent," he may "thereby save the lease from forfeiture." The lease in such cases is not terminated by the expiration of the term fixed therein, or by any provision therein for a termination by the parties, but solely because of the default in the payment of rent, the subsequent notice, the lapse of 3 days, and the ensuing forfeiture. The established rule is that, where the right to a forfeiture is created by contract or by law, "It has always been considered that it was necessary to restrain it to the most technical limits of the terms and conditions upon which the right is to be exercised." Jameson v. Chanslor-Canfield, etc., Co., 176 Cal. 11, 167 Pac. 369; Randol v. Scott, 110 Cal. 596, 42 Pac. 976. Under this rule it must be admitted that the forfeiture does not occur until the last of the acts which are to create it has occurred. It therefore does not take place until there has been a failure to pay the rent during the 3 days allowed by the statute. It follows, also, that if the lease is not terminated by such forfeiture it remains in force for the remainder of the term, or until it is ended in some manner by some subsequent act or agreement. The respondent concedes that if Ibos and Roche had paid the rent themselves at any time within the 3 days following the service of the notice the lease would have remained in force to the same extent as if no notice had been given. The landlord could not have accepted the rent during that period and at the same time have claimed that the notice itself forfeited the estate and terminated the lease. Since forfeitures are not favored in law, the consequence of these principles would be that if the rent was paid in any manner or from any security provided therefor by Ibos and Roche, or by any other person for their benefit, during the three days, the forfeiture is thereby waived and the lease will remain in force.

The respondent claims that this result is avoided by reason of the fact that the deposit in the bank was not made by Ibos and Roche, nor at their instance, so far as appears, but was made by Downing at the time of the sale from Butcher to the Cutting Packing Company, and apparently for some purpose in the interest of Butcher or Downing. If it was done for this purpose, the fact is not fully disclosed by the record. But we regard the point as immaterial, for whatever the motive or inducement to Downing or Butcher may have been, the result was that the security inured to the benefit of Ibos and Roche and to their landlord, the Cutting Packing Company. Ibos and Roche remained in possession after the security was deposited, and availed themselves of the benefit thereof by allowing the rent to be paid out of that fund, instead of paying it themselves. After the giving of the notice to quit they still remained in possession, and continued therein until the payments here in controversy were made. It must therefore be presumed that they consented to such payments. The bank stood in the position of their agent with respect to the matter of making the actual payments of the rent, and the payments operated to their benefit. The forfeiture, as we have seen, had not occurred at the time the payment of February 4 was made. If the notice had terminated the lease or created the forfeiture, or if Ibos and Roche desired that it should have that effect, it was their duty to vacate the premises on or before the expiration of the 3-day period, and also to give notice to the bank to withhold further payments of rent accruing after the 1st of February. Since they did not do either of these things, the conclusion must follow that they acquiesced in the payment, and that the lease was not forfeited, but remained in force as completely as if no proceedings for forfeiture had been begun, and that the security deposited for the payment of rent remained available to the Cutting Packing Company for that purpose.

The respondent, in support of the position that the notice terminated the lease, cites 1 Wood on Landlord and Tenant, § 44; Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant, 423; Underhill on Landlord and Tenant, § 127; Alden v. Mayfield, 164 Cal. 11, 127 Pac. 45; Myers v. Herskowitz, 33 Cal. App. 581, 584, 165 Pac. 1031; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Penn. R. R. Co. (C. C.) 120 Fed. 365; Wisner v. Richards, 62 Wash. 429, 113 Pac. 1090, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 160; Doe v. Calvert, 2 Camp. 388; Cheney v. Batten, 1 Cowp. 245; Fitzpatrick v. Childs, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 367. An examination of these authorities shows that they all relate to notices to quit which did not involve a forfeiture, but which, either by reason of the law or of some clause in the lease providing therefor operated to terminate the tenancy between the parties. Thus, in Alden v. Mayfield, there was a tenancy from month to month, which had been terminated by a 30-day notice, as the law provides it may be. Civ. Code, §§ 1944, 1946. In Western Union T. Co. v. Penn. R. R. Co. the lease itself provided that it could be terminated by either party on 6 months' notice, and such notice had been given. Even in that case the court recognized the rule for which the defendant here contends by saying:

"It will be observed that withdrawal of a notice to quit is not, like a waiver of forfeiture, the act of one party, but requires the assent of both; and, when such joint assent is given, it creates a new tenancy." 120 Fed. 385.

In this way it distinguishes cases where the notice itself terminates the tenancy from cases where the tenancy is only terminated by the occurrence of a forfeiture. The passage quoted also recognizes the law to be that the forfeiture may be waived by the action of the party in whose favor it occurs, without the concurrence or consent of the party upon whom it is to be inflicted. In Wisner v. Richards the lease in question was terminable by its own provisions by a month's notice given by either party. The same is true of all the other cases, except Myers v. Herskowitz. That case is somewhat peculiar, but it is not authority in favor of the plaintiff. The lease there contained a covenant that the tenant should keep a certain passageway clear of obstructions. The notice to quit was given under subdivision 3 of section 1161, requiring the tenant to perform the covenant or quit possession. Suit was begun 10 days after the notice was served; the tenant continued in possession, and thereafter the landlord accepted rent from him during the pendency of the action until near the time of judgment. The court held that the acceptance of rent while the tenant so remained in possession was not a waiver of the forfeiture arising from the notice to perform the covenant or quit, unless it was received in such a manner as to imply that it was so intended by the landlord.

There are authorities in support of the contention of the appellant. In Tuttle v. Bean, 54 Mass. (13 Mete.) 275, it is held that if, after giving the notice to quit, the landlord told the tenant that he need not quit in pursuance of the notice, it constituted a waiver of the notice and prevented a forfeiture of the lease. In Hodgkins v. Price, 137 Mass. 13, it was held that where a notice to quit for nonpayment of rent was given, the forfeiture does not become absolute until the time given in the notice under the statute has run; the court saying:

"Until then the tenant has the right to pay or tender the rent, and reinstate himself in his rights. * * * The forfeiture is at most conditional, and may be purged and saved by the payment or tender of the rent due."

This language, it will be observed, is substantially the same as the above-quoted clause from subdivision 3, § 1161. The following cases are substantially to the same effect and support the appellant's claims: Whitney v. Swett, 22 N. H. 10, 53 Am. Dec. 228; Norris v. Morrill, 43 N. H. 213.

The appellant also cites cases which declare the rule to be that, even in cases of the first class above described, where the notice operates to fix the end of the tenancy prior to the time it would otherwise expire, the notice can be waived by the landlord, and the tenant restored to his original term. This question, however, we need not consider. It is not involved in the case.

It is apparent, from these considerations, that the court erred in holding that the lease was terminated by the giving of the notice to quit, and that the security deposited was not available to the appellant as a fund for the payment of the subsequent rents.

The judgment is reversed.

McCAHAN v. McCAHAN. (Civ. 3320.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 20, 1920.)

1. Contracts — Agreement of husband to pay fees and costs of divorce action contra bonos mores.

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 158, an agreement between husband and wife, in advance and in anticipation of a divorce action being brought, to pay the wife's counsel fees and costs, is void as contra bonos mores.

2. Divorce — Court may compel husband to pay wife money to prosecute appeal.

Under Civ. Code, § 137, the court may, during the pendency of a divorce action, compel the husband to pay the wife any money necessary to prosecute or defend the cause; and this power is not exhausted upon the rendition of the judgment in the trial court, but continues during the pendency of an appeal.

3. Divorce — Good faith and merit of appeal by wife determined from showing in lower court on application for suit money.

The question of good faith and merit of an appeal by a wife in an action for divorce is a matter to be considered and determined from the showing made in the lower court upon application for allowance of counsel fees and costs, under Civ. Code, § 137.

4. Divorce — Agreements as to counsel fees to be subjected to examination of trial court.

Ante-divorce agreements as to costs and counsel fees must be subjected to the examination of the trial court to see that they are fair and equitable, the matter being vested by Civ. Code, § 137, in the exclusive jurisdiction of the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Daniel F. McCahan against Lillian McCahan for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. From an order directing plaintiff to pay to defendant a certain amount as costs and counsel fees on appeal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 190 Pac. 460.

Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for appellant. J. J. Cairns and H. L. Ford, both of Eureka, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal from an order directing the appellant to pay to his wife, the respondent, $343 as costs and counsel fees, on appeal in a divorce action, in which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and from which judgment the respondent here appealed.

The complaint is on the ground of extreme cruelty. The defendant answered denying the allegations of cruelty, and filed a cross-complaint for permanent support and maintenance, and in which she also alleged that a certain contract of separation, theretofore entered into by the parties, was executed by reason of undue influence. This allegation plaintiff denied. The case was tried by a jury, which answered all of the special interrogatories submitted to it in favor of the plaintiff. These answers were adopted and approved by the court, which made certain additional findings of its own motion. With full knowledge of the facts, it sanctioned the agreement in part, and granted a decree of divorce to the plaintiff. That judgment was affirmed by this court. McCahan v. McCahan, 190 Pac. 460 (No. 3330), this day decided. A complete statement of the facts of the case is contained in that opinion.

After judgment the defendant moved the court, on affidavits showing she was practically destitute and had no means of her own, for an order directing plaintiff to pay her costs and counsel fees on appeal. The plaintiff filed a counter-affidavit in which he alleged the execution of the contract of separation referred to; that it provided for, and he had paid to the defendant, the sum of $100 for her costs and counsel fees in the action. He objected to making any further payments, and interposed the stipulation of the contract as a bar to the granting of the motion. The court overruled the objection, and, refusing to be governed by the provision of the contract relating to counsel fees and costs, made the allowance complained of. The question presented on this appeal is the right of the court to make the order, in view of the provision in the contract, which is as follows:

"(6) In the event that any action for divorce shall ever be instituted between the parties hereto, then and in such event it is agreed that there shall be awarded to the party of the second part the sum of one hundred ($100.00) dollars in full settlement of all her claims for counsel fees and costs herein; and it is further agreed that said sum shall be awarded in one action only."

[1] Under our Code either husband or wife may enter into any agreement or transaction with the other respecting property which either might if unmarried. Civ. Code, sec. 158. Notwithstanding this freedom to so contract, it has been repeatedly held in this state that an agreement between husband and wife to do anything to facilitate procuring a divorce is illegal and void. Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 292, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548.

We think it requires no lengthy discussion to point out the circumstances under which an agreement in advance, and, in anticipation of a divorce action being brought, to pay the counsel fees and costs, may operate to facilitate a dissolution of the marriage tie. Such being its effect, it is void as contra bonos mores. Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 5, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107.

[2-4] For another reason the trial court was warranted in disregarding the provision in the contract relating to counsel fees and costs. Our statute provides that during the pendency of a divorce action the court may, in its discretion, compel the husband to pay the wife any money necessary to prosecute or defend the cause. Civ. Code, sec. 137. This power is not exhausted upon the rendition of the judgment in the trial court, but continues during the pendency of the appeal. Bruce v. Bruce, 160 Cal. 28, 30, 116 Pac. 66. The question of the good faith and merit of the appeal is a matter to be considered and determined from the showing made in the lower court and upon which the order for the allowance is based. Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 237, 240, 79 Pac. 885. The courts of this state have consistently recognized and upheld the broad discretionary power vested in the trial judges by the above section of the Code in these matters. In refusing to sanction an agreement between an attorney and a plaintiff in a divorce action for a contingent fee, the Supreme Court pointed out that in such cases "the law has taken care that the wife shall not be without assistance in proper cases either to prosecute or defend such actions. * * * The reason or necessity therefor does not exist in such cases as in the others for allowing contingent attorneys' fees, and where the reason ceases the rule or law also ceases." Newman v. Freitas, supra. In yet another case the same court was called upon to construe a contract similar, in effect, to the provision in the agreement we are here considering. It was there said: "Nor in case of suit could the agreement control the action of the court in the exercise of its discretion in allowing alimony or counsel fees." In re Estate of Sloane, 179 Cal. 393, 177 Pac. 150. Assuming, as claimed by appellant, but not so holding, that it may have been unnecessary for the court, in deciding the case, to have used the language quoted, we consider the statement significant, as being in complete accord with what we conceive to be the consistent policy of the courts of this state in such matters.

Appellant relies upon the case of Lee v. Lee, 55 Mont. 426, 178 Pac. 173, as fully supporting his contention. While the court there takes a view contrary to that which seems to prevail in this state, we are unwilling to accept it as final authority. We are satisfied it is best to leave the matter of costs and counsel fees in divorce actions to the discretion of the trial court, in whose exclusive jurisdiction it has been vested by legislative enactment. If it is desirable or expedient to settle these matters out of court, such agreements must be subjected to the examination of the court. Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 513, 39 Pac. 801. If fair and equitable, the arrangement between the parties will no doubt receive its sanction.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: KNIGHT, Judge pro tem.; RICHARDS, J.

McCAHAN v. McCAHAN. (Civ. 3330.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 20, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡110—Order on motion for new trial is not appealable.

An appeal from order denying motion for new trial is not authorized under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, and will be dismissed.

2. Appeal and error ⚡766, 767(1)—Brief not complying with rules may be stricken.

Where the opening brief is not typewritten, not indexed, only four copies are filed, and no attempt seems to have been made in its preparation to conform to the requirements of rule 8 of the appellate court (176 Pac. ix), and instead of calling the attention of the court to certain parts of the record, as directed in Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, contains merely portions of voluminous testimony, without any reference to the transcript, and with but little comment as to the nature and effect of the evidence, the appellate court would be justified in dismissing the appeal or striking brief from the files.

3. Appeal and error ⚡771—Failure of husband to furnish counsel fees and costs no excuse for failing to file brief.

The fact that a wife is penniless, and that the superior court made an order directing the husband to pay appellant wife sufficient money to enable her to print her brief, and that husband appealed from this order and gave a bond staying execution of the order, is no sufficient justification for not filing a proper opening brief.

4. Divorce ⚡93(3)—Not necessary to allege mental suffering was wrongfully inflicted.

In order to state a cause of action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty under Civ. Code, § 94, it is not necessary to state that grievous mental suffering was "wrongfully" inflicted, where the only rational inference from the allegations of the complaint is that the "infliction" was "wrongful."

5. Pleading ⚡406(5)—Complaint held sufficient on appeal though subject to special demurrer if made.

Failure of a complaint in a divorce action, on the ground of extreme cruelty, under Civ. Code, § 94, to state that grievous mental suffering was "wrongfully" inflicted, was a defect which could have been reached by special de-murrer, and not having been so attacked, must be held sufficient on appeal.

6. Divorce ⚡27(1)—Mental suffering may be "extreme cruelty."

Grievous mental suffering may constitute and be the equivalent of extreme cruelty, under Civ. Code, § 94.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Extreme Cruelty.]

7. Divorce ⚡184(10)—What constitutes grievous mental suffering a question of fact not ordinarily reviewable.

Whether in any case the course of conduct complained of as a ground for divorce constitutes "grievous mental suffering" is a question of fact on which the trial court's finding will not be disturbed on appeal, unless the evidence in support thereof is so slight as to indicate a want of ordinary good judgment and an abuse of discretion.

8. Contracts ⚡111—Entered into to facilitate divorce void.

An agreement entered into between parties with the object of dissolving a marriage contract, or facilitating that result, is void.

9. Husband and wife ⚡278(1)—May agree to immediate separation and provide for support of either.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, either husband or wife may enter into any agreement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which they might if unmarried, and they may agree in writing to immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them, or their children, during such separation.

10. Contracts ⚡111—Agreement to pay attorney fee to wife in anticipated divorce action void.

A portion of a separation agreement providing for the payment of an attorney fee to the wife in the event that either of the parties should ever institute a divorce action against the other was void.

11. Contracts ⚡137(3)—Provision for payment of attorney fee to wife in event of divorce did not render entire separation agreement void.

A portion of a separation agreement providing for the payment of an attorney fee to the wife in event either of the parties should ever institute a divorce action against the other did not render the entire agreement void, relating to a different subject, and being entirely distinct, disconnected, and separable from the valid provisions of the contract.

12. Divorce ⚡249(2)—Separation agreement considered in regard to disposition of community property.

Trial court in a divorce action has unlimited authority to make disposition of community property of the parties, under Civ. Code, §§ 146, 147; and, where it is made to appear that a division of property has been made in a separation agreement, the court necessarily has jurisdiction to consider the instrument, and to affirm it or disregard it, if it is found to be void.

13. Divorce ⚭249(2)—Trial court held to have ratified agreement as to division of community property.

Where the trial court, in its decree in a divorce case, made no division of the property of the parties, or provision for support of the wife, but recognized and expressly reserved to her the power to assert such rights and benefits as might accrue to her under a previously executed contract of separation, there was a ratification of the separation agreement to that extent.

14. Husband and wife ⚭278(1)—Trial court may not interfere with valid separation contract dividing community property.

The trial court in a divorce action cannot interfere with a separation contract wherein community property was divided, under Civ. Code, §§ 146, 147, unless it was procured in violation of the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, or was not fairly made, or was obtained by coercion, intimidation, or undue influence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action for divorce by Daniel F. McCahan against Lillian McCahan. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 190 Pac. 458.

J. J. Cairns and H. L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant.

Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. [1] Defendant appeals from the judgment granting her husband, the plaintiff, a decree of divorce. She also appeals from the order of the court denying her motion for a new trial. The latter appeal was unauthorized and is dismissed. Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

[2] Were it not for the nature of the action and the situation of the appellant, we would feel justified in dismissing this appeal, or striking the opening brief from the files. It is typewritten, not indexed, only four copies were filed, and no attempt seems to have been made in its preparation to conform to the requirements of rule 8 of this court (176 Pac. ix). Instead of calling the attention of the court to certain parts of the record, as provided in section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, the brief appears to contain merely those portions of the voluminous testimony considered by the appellant to be favorable to her contentions, without any reference to the transcript, and with but little comment as to the nature and effect of the evidence.

[3] The failure and neglect of appellant in these particulars has not only obstructed our examination of the record, but has rendered it well-nigh impossible for us to use the brief for that purpose. In justification of her failure to print her brief, appellant makes it appear that she is penniless, depending for the greater part of her livelihood upon the charity of relatives; that on motion, and after taking evidence, the superior court made its order directing the respondent to pay to appellant sufficient money to enable her to print her brief; that from this order respondent appealed, and that appeal is now pending in this court; that the respondent gave a bond staying the execution of the order, thus completely denying appellant the means wherewith to comply with the rule of the court relative to printing her brief. This statement is borne out by the record, and for this reason we have refrained from dismissing the appeal or striking the brief from the files. There is not, however, sufficient justification for the manner in which the appellant's appeal is presented in the brief. Notwithstanding the labor involved, we have made a complete examination of the record in considering the points made by the appellant in seeking a reversal of the judgment and decree.

Defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint, filed a cross-complaint seeking a division of the community property and permanent alimony, and praying that a certain agreement whereby the parties agreed to live separate and apart from each other, providing for disposition of their property, and fixing an attorney fee in the event that an action of divorce should ever be instituted by either of the parties, be declared null and void. The case was tried with a jury, which decided in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant, on all the special issues submitted to it. These answers were adopted by the court, which made additional findings of its own. The judgment and decree in favor of plaintiff followed, from which defendant appeals.

Appellant first attacks the sufficiency of the complaint. The plaintiff charged that the defendant secretly accepted the attentions of a man other than her husband, entertaining him in her home both in the daytime and in the nighttime, always in the absence of her husband; that she accompanied this man, without the knowledge and consent of her husband, to picnics and dances, and associated with him, in the privacy of her own home and in public places, to such an extent that her relations with said man became a matter of common gossip and scandal in the place where the parties resided, all of which became known to plaintiff; that she secreted stolen property in the house of plaintiff, and applied vile, insulting names and epithets to him; that she endeavored to strike him with an iron; that she impugned the chastity of his female friends; that she laid down in the public streets, screeching and screaming at the top of her voice; that she frequently threw herself on the floor, remaining there screaming for hours at a time; that she repeatedly threatened to kill and murder her husband; that she frequently threatened suicide, and said she would cut her throat; that she endeavored to get hold of weapons for that purpose; that she quarreled with her husband until late hours of the night; that she attempted to tear out her own hair and to bite plaintiff's hands; that she did all these things and many others without cause or provocation, "all of which caused plaintiff great shame and humiliation, and inflicted upon him grievous mental suffering."

[4, 5] Appellant's contention is that, by reason of the failure to state that the grievous mental suffering was "wrongfully" inflicted, the complaint is insufficient to state a cause of action for extreme cruelty, under section 94 of the Civil Code. As was said in Nelson v. Nelson, 18 Cal. App. 602, 605, 123 Pac. 1099, 1101, "if this does not present a case of 'the wrongful infliction of * * * grievous mental suffering' we have totally misconceived the language employed." Furthermore, we do not understand that the pleader is required to adopt the exact language of the statute in pleading the cause of action, under the section mentioned. It is sufficient if, by appropriate averments, the proper qualification appears. As was said in the case last noted, the only rational inference from the allegation of the complaint is that the "infliction" was "wrongful." Furthermore, if there was any defect in the complaint it was one which could have been reached by special demurrer, and, not having been so attacked, it must be held to be sufficient. Mayr v. Mayr, 161 Cal. 134, 136, 118 Pac. 546.

[6] Appellant contends that the acts charged in the complaint, before summarized by us, even if true, did not constitute cruelty. She places her reliance upon the decision of Waldron v. Waldron, 85 Cal. 257, 24 Pac. 649, 858, 9 L. R. A. 487, wherein it was decided by a divided court that grievous mental suffering is not the equivalent of extreme cruelty, in a legal sense. The rule there laid down was criticized and overruled in Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 175, 30 Pac. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660. The more rational rule laid down in that case has been universally and consistently followed in this state ever since. Fleming v. Fleming, 95 Cal. 430, 434, 30 Pac. 566, 29 Am. St. Rep. 124; Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 184, 187, 52 Pac. 298; Smith v. Smith, 124 Cal. 651, 652, 57 Pac. 573; Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571, 573, 166 Pac. 330.

view the voluminous record of the evidence of some 30 witnesses who testified for the opposing side. No good can be effected by doing so, for the most that the appellant can urge in support of her contention that the findings and judgment are not sustained by the evidence is a conflict of testimony arising for the most part in the respective stories told by the plaintiff and the defendant. Whether in any case the course of conduct complained of constitutes "grievous mental suffering" is a question of fact. "The judge who tries the action, and has the parties before him for observation in the light of the evidence, is the one to whom the law commits the determination of this question in the first instance; and, as was said in Andrews v. Andrews, 120 Cal. 187, 52 Pac. 298, this court will not disturb a finding that particular acts constitute grievous mental suffering unless 'the evidence in support of the finding is so slight as to indicate a want of ordinary good judgment and an abuse of discretion by the trial court.'" Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 244, 82 Pac. 967, 969; McDonald v. McDonald, 155 Cal. 665, 670, 102 Pac. 927, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 45; Dupes v. Dupes, 184 Pac. 425. We are fully satisfied that the conclusions of the trial court as to the weight and sufficiency of the evidence to support the allegations of the complaint, and the decree of divorce entered thereon, are correct.

Appellant sought at the trial to avoid the legal effect of the separation agreement entered into between herself and husband upon the ground that it was procured by undue influence. By this contract the parties agreed to live separate and apart, divided their property, provided for the custody and education of the minor child of the parties, stipulated an amount to be paid monthly for the support and maintenance of the defendant and the child, and relinquished to each other all obligations growing out of their marital relations, except as in the contract provided, including the right to inherit one from the other. The agreement also provided for an attorney fee of $100 "in the event that any action for divorce shall ever be instituted between the parties." This stipulation of the contract imposed no obligation on the wife to sue for a divorce; and the making of the contract was followed by the actual separation of the parties, during which the plaintiff paid the defendant the sum of $22.50 a month as therein provided for the support of herself and child. The agreement awarded what little community property the parties had to the defendant. The plaintiff, a laborer, has no separate property other than an interest in certain land, which is subject to the life estate of his mother, and which was found by the court to be worth $10,000.

From the evidence it appears, and the court so found, that prior to the execution of the agreement the plaintiff and defendant had discussed between themselves the subject of the contract which it was proposed by them to enter into, and agreed upon practically all of its terms. On the date of its execution the plaintiff and the defendant went together to the office of the attorney whom the plaintiff had selected, and stated to him, both parties being present, the terms which they had agreed upon. In the afternoon of the same day they returned to the office of the attorney, who in the meantime had drafted the agreement. He read it aloud to the parties, explaining the various provisions and terms and stating their meaning to them. Before the document was signed the defendant was instructed and advised by the attorney that she had the right to consult her own attorney or adviser, but she declined to do so. Prior to signing the agreement, however, she telephoned to a reputable and competent attorney of Eureka, who later appeared for her and represented her in this action. During the conversation with him she stated she did not desire his aid or advice in the matter of the agreement. The evidence fails to disclose that the defendant was in any way coerced or induced by any means against her will to enter into the contract.

[8-11] There is no evidence that the agreement was entered into between the parties with the object of dissolving the marriage contract or facilitating that result. Such contracts are void. Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 283, 289, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548. Under our Code either husband or wife may enter into any agreement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which they might if unmarried. Civ. Code, § 158. They may also agree in writing to immediate separation, and may make provision for the support of either of them, and of their children during such separation. Civ. Code, § 159. The agreement in question was apparently drawn pursuant to the authority thus given, and was one which the parties had the right to enter into. Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 4, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107; Walker v. Walker, 14 Cal. App. 487, 493, 112 Pac. 479. Although that portion of the agreement, providing for the payment of an attorney fee to the wife, in the event that either of the parties should ever institute a divorce action against the other, is void (McCahan v. McCahan, 190 Pac. 458, No. 3320, this day decided), it relates to a different subject, and is entirely distinct, disconnected, and separable from, and does not invalidate, the valid provisions of the contract. Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393-397, 177 Pac. 150; Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 134, 58 Pac. 372; Beard v. Beard, 65 Cal. 354, 356, 4 Pac. 229.

[12, 13] The trial court, having jurisdiction of the divorce action, had unlimited authority to make disposition of the community property of the parties. Civ. Code, §§ 146, 147. Whenever, therefore, it was made to appear that a division of the property had been made in accordance with the terms of the separation agreement, the court necessarily had jurisdiction to consider the instrument, and to affirm it, or to disregard it if it was found to be void. "Such pretended agreements, if they are to have any force, must be subjected to the examination of the divorce court, and derive their sanction from a decree made by the court with a knowledge of the facts." Loveren v. Loveren, 106 Cal. 509, 513, 39 Pac. 801, 802. The court, in the instant case, in its decree made no division of the property of the parties, or provision for the support of the defendant, but did recognize and expressly reserve to her the power to assert such rights and benefits as might accrue to her under the previously executed articles of separation. This action on its part we construe to be a ratification of the agreement to that extent.

[14] Measured by the standard of the Code provisions, and construed in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution and subsequent performance, it is manifest that, in so far as it deals with the property rights of the parties, the contract is a valid agreement with which the court could not interfere, unless from the evidence it was authorized to find that it was procured in violation of the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other. It did not so find. Being fairly made, and not being obtained by coercion, intimidation, or undue influence, the trial court was correct in refusing to vacate and set it aside. Murray v. Murray, 28 Cal. App. 533, 535, 153 Pac. 248.

The judgment is affirmed.

Attachment $\S$ 13—Not authorized in suit upon judgment secured in another state; "contract of record."

A judgment in another state is a "contract of record" not providing that payment shall be made in this state, so that when sued upon here no attachment is authorized under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 537.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Mary Erickson against O. S. Erickson. From an order dissolving plaintiff's attachment, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. W. Benshoof, of Riverside, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from an order dissolving an attachment issued at the instance of the plaintiff. The action was brought in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles and the cause of action stated was upon liability created by a judgment which judgment was entered against defendant in the state of Washington. Plaintiff, as a prerequisite to the issuance of the attachment, made her affidavit in which she alleged that—

Her claim was "for money due, owing, and unpaid on account of judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, and that such contract was made and is payable in this state. * * *

Section 537, Code of Civil Procedure, permits attachment to be issued in an action upon a contract, express or implied, for the direct payment of money, "where the contract is made or is payable in this state." As to whether a judgment in any clear sense constitutes a contract is open to debate. English writers on the common law decline to give it that general character because, for one thing, a judgment in contested cases lacks the essential of consent of the party to be bound. However, judgments were sometimes classified as "contracts of record" upon the assumption that a promise would be implied in law on the part of the judgment debtor to pay the amount adjudged to be due from him. A diversity of opinion is to be found in the decisions on the question. However, the Supreme Court of this state has affirmed the position that a suit upon a judgment is an action upon contract. Bean v.

Loryea, 81 Cal. 151, 22 Pac. 513, and cases cited therein. Moreover, appellant here necessarily confirmed that view, and respondent concedes that the law is so established. A contract is presumed to be payable where made, in the absence of terms providing otherwise. Tuller v. Arnold, 93 Cal. 168, 28 Pac. 863. The bald question then for determination is as to whether a contract made in another state, and which contains no terms providing that payment shall be made in this state, is such a contract as authorizes an attachment to issue in an action brought here. The answer must be in the negative. It has been directly so held. Dulton v. Shelton, 3 Cal. 206; Eck v. Hoffman, 55 Cal. 502; Tuller v. Arnold, supra. The cause of action, therefore, as shown, was not based upon a contract made or payable in California, and hence no attachment was authorized to be issued therein. The Oregon case cited by appellant (Meyer v. Brooks et ux., 29 Or. 203, 44 Pac. 281, 54 Am. St. Rep. 790) was evidently decided under a statute different in terms from those of our section 537, Code of Civil Procedure.

SHERMAN v. SHERMAN. (Civ. 3358.)

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 932(1)—That motion for allowance of counsel fees was made in action for separate maintenance held presumed.

On appeal from default judgment for separate maintenance, where no findings were necessary and no bill of exceptions was presented, it will be presumed, to sustain that portion of the judgment awarding counsel fees, that plaintiff proceeded in the customary manner by moving for counsel fees before trial and the allowance evidenced by the final judgment cannot be attacked on the theory that it was unwarranted under Civ. Code, $\S$ 137, allowing counsel fees necessary for the prosecution of the action because not made until the end of the action.

2. Husband and wife $\S$ 299(1)—Community cannot be divided in suit for separate maintenance, where the complaint did not seek such relief.

While under Civ. Code, $\S$ 137, as amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 35), the court may, in an action for maintenance alone, make the same disposition of the community as could have been made if the marriage had been dissolved, but such award can be sustained only on the theory that it is necessary and reasonable; hence, where the complaint did not seek such relief, but alleged that the defendant husband was receiving a salary of \$200 per month, and that the sum of \$75 was a reasonable sum for plaintiff's maintenance, a division of the community was not on default judgment warranted.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by Edith Sherman against H. G. Sherman for separate maintenance. From portions of the judgment awarding attorney's fees and assigning the community property, defendant appeals. Modified by striking out the portion awarding plaintiff the community property, and as modified affirmed.

S. V. Wright, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant.

W. C. Carpenter, of Alturas, and M. R. Van Wormer, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant by default upon a complaint for separate maintenance, charging him with adultery. The judgment awarded plaintiff the sum of $75 per month for her support and maintenance in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and in addition thereto allowed her the sum of $100 as attorney's fees in said action, and assigned to her all the community property of the respective parties. The appeal is taken from the portions of the judgment awarding attorney's fees and assigning the community property.

In respect to the matters complained of, the complaint alleges that the parties owned certain community property consisting of money in bank and an automobile, all of which it is alleged the defendant threatened to withdraw and dispose of for the purpose of leaving plaintiff without means of support. It is further alleged that the plaintiff will, "unless she has some maintenance from her said husband, be dependent upon her friends for support. That the sum of $75 per month is a reasonable sum to be allowed this plaintiff for her support and maintenance." The prayer of the complaint asks for a reasonable sum as temporary and permanent alimony for the support of the plaintiff, for counsel fees and costs, and for general relief.

[1] In attacking that portion of the judgment allowing counsel fees, appellant relies upon Lacey v. Lacey, 108 Cal. 45, 40 Pac. 1056, which holds that the court is without power to make an allowance for counsel fees in the final judgment, for the reason that, the services of counsel having then been completed, no award is necessary "for the prosecution of the action," as contemplated by section 137, Civil Code. But the rule of that case does not apply here, because, this being a default judgment in which no findings were necessary and no bill of exceptions presented upon the appeal, all presumptions of regularity in the proceedings must be included in to support the judgment. Thus, it must be presumed for want of showing to the contrary that, before the commencement of the trial, plaintiff proceeded in the usual and customary way by moving the court for an allowance of counsel fees necessary for the prosecution of the action, and that this motion was granted by the court, as evidenced by its final judgment.

[2] In assigning to plaintiff the entire community property of the parties, the court was bound by the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, which alone were admitted to be true by defendant's default. Clearly the allegations relating to the community property were inserted for the purpose of procuring an injunction to restrain defendant from disposing of this property for the purpose of defeating the monthly award for maintenance for which plaintiff prayed. No notice was given to defendant that any disposition of the community property was sought. Plaintiff expressly alleged that defendant was drawing a salary of $200 per month; that the sum of $75 per month was a reasonable sum for her support and maintenance; and prayed that the court award such reasonable sum for that purpose. Manifestly under such allegations the court would not be justified in awarding a larger sum for the support and maintenance of the plaintiff without amendment or notice to the defendant. Under the prayer for general relief a court cannot give a plaintiff judgment by default which is not supported by the allegations of the complaint. Concededly, under the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 35) to section 137 of the Civil Code, the court may, in an action for maintenance alone, make the same disposition of the community property as could have been made if the marriage had been dissolved; but where under such section the community property is awarded to the plaintiff without dissolution of the marriage, such award can be sustained only upon the theory that it is necessary and reasonable for the maintenance and support of the wife or for the wife and children where such relief is sought, because it is for that purpose alone that the action can be maintained, section 137 providing that "the court, in granting the wife permanent support and maintenance, * * * shall make the same disposition of the community property," etc. The marriage state continues; the community is not dissolved; the parties may continue to live together and acquire and enjoy community property.

Where, therefore, the complaint expressly puts in issue the reasonableness of the sum necessary for support and maintenance by allegations that a specific sum is reasonable for such purposes, and admits, by failure to allege otherwise, that the community property is not necessary for such support and maintenance, the default of the defendant admits the issue as so presented and nothing more.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the portion thereof awarding to plaintiff the community property, and as so modified will stand affirmed.

Ex parte JAMES. (Cr. 520.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 23, 1920.)

1. Criminal law — 238—Sufficient cause to believe accused guilty authorizes magistrate to hold him.

A committing magistrate may reject the testimony of accused, and believe that of other witnesses, and he is not required to confine himself to the doctrine of reasonable doubt; it being sufficient if sufficient cause exists to believe accused guilty, in view of Penal Code, § 872.

2. Criminal law — 238—Probable cause held to exist for holding one accused of obtaining sheep by falsely pretending to have bank deposit.

Where accused was charged with obtaining sheep worth $16,000 on a false pretense that he had $6,000 on deposit in a certain bank, giving the vendors a check for the whole amount under a promise to deposit a sufficient amount to make the check good by a named day, and it appeared that he did not have $6,000 on deposit, the commitment was authorized.

Application for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed against the sheriff of San Joaquin county, to secure release of petitioner. Writ dismissed.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by F. O. James, to be directed against the sheriff of San Joaquin county. Writ dismissed and petitioner remanded.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Edward Van Vranken, Dist. Atty., and E. P. Foltz, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Stockton, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. Application for a writ of habeas corpus upon the ground that the petitioner is held to answer upon a criminal charge without probable cause. He is charged with obtaining sheep worth about $16,000 upon the false pretense that, at the time of so doing, he had $6,000 on deposit in a certain bank. The petitioner denies making such a pretense, but admits that at the time he did not have said amount, or, in fact, any amount in excess of 80 cents, on deposit. He engaged to purchase the sheep from the owners. The sheep were counted out and loaded on the cars ready for delivery. He thereupon informed the owners that he had $6,000 on deposit, and that by the following Saturday he would deposit such further sums as were necessary to meet the check which he then offered to them, and which they accepted. They testified, and the court necessarily found, that they would not have parted with the title if they had not believed his statement that he had $6,000 on deposit.

1. The petitioner insists that he should be discharged because he informed the sellers that he did not have sufficient funds in the bank to meet the check. It is quite true that he so informed them, but he is not charged with the representation that the check would be paid on presentation. Both he and they knew that it could not be paid before the following Saturday, and his own testimony shows that he knew it could not be paid in full even then. The false representation with which he stands charged is that he then and there had on deposit $6,000. He took the sheep of these men, gave them a worthless check in payment, and within a few hours sold the sheep to other parties. That he may have intended, in fact, to meet the check in the future may be conceded, but this does not modify the fact, as found by the magistrate, that he obtained this considerable amount of property upon the false representation that he had a large sum on deposit.

[1] 2. The petitioner further insists that the false representation, in order to be criminal, must relate to an existing fact, and that it cannot relate to an act to be performed in the future, as a mere promise to pay. This rule, as a mere statement of the law, is sound, and is upheld in People v. Green, 22 Cal. App. 45, 133 Pac. 334, but it has no application to the facts of this case as shown above. The magistrate was clothed with authority to reject the testimony of the petitioner, and to believe that of the other witnesses, nor is he required to confine himself to the doctrine of reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if there existed sufficient cause to believe that the petitioner is guilty. In re Vandiveer, 4 Cal. App. 653, 88 Pac. 993.

[2] The owners of the sheep testify that they relied, in parting with their title, upon the fact that the petitioner had $6,000 of ready money. The essence of the alleged crime arises out of the fact, not that he could not pay the check, but that he was short by $6,000 of his claimed assets.

It may well be, as insisted by the owners, that they were willing, in view of his deposit of $6,000 in cash, to look to the band of sheep and other properties for the remaining ten thousand.

3. Petitioner's claim that the evidence must show an intent to defraud beyond a reasonable doubt is answered by the case last cited, although the specific question as to intent did not arise in that case. However, section 872 of the Penal Code provides that a defendant must be held "if it appears from the examination that a public offense has been committed." This language imports a degree of conviction far short of a belief beyond a reasonable doubt. Ex parte Becker, 86 Cal. 402, 25 Pac. 9, is in point. In that case the court discusses the degree of proof required before a committing magistrate and says:

"Whether it is sufficient to convict beyond a reasonable doubt, it is the province of the jury to say, and ought not to be determined in advance on habeas corpus."

The cases cited by petitioner in support of his claim do not deal with the measure of proof, and are not in point. No authority has been brought to our attention, and we feel assured that none exists, holding that a committing magistrate must, in a case of the character under review, be satisfied as to any fact beyond a reasonable doubt.

We discover no adequate reason for disturbing the commitment. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

DUNTON et al. v. TANIGOSHI et al.
(Civ. 2820.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1920.)

1. Judgment ☞ 155—Notice of motion to set aside default sufficient where date was correctly given, though day was improperly named.

Where a notice recited that motion to set aside a default would be made on Wednesday, the 1st day of July, the specification of Wednesday may be disregarded as immaterial, and the notice deemed sufficient, though the 1st of July fell on Monday instead of Wednesday.

2. Judgment ☞ 155—Notice that motion to vacate default would be made at 10 o'clock sufficient, though the same was not heard until 11.

Notice of motion to vacate a default, which specified it would be made at 10 o'clock, is sufficient, though the court by an arrangement of its law and motion calendar segregated causes, and under such segregation the clerk placed the motion on the calendar for 11 instead of 10; for the notice was sufficient to bring the opposite party into court, and, if there was any postponement, he was bound to take notice of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Cora Dunton and others against Ida May Tanigoshi and another. After default judgment was entered, defendants' motion to set aside the same was granted, and plaintiffs appeal. Order affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. After the plaintiffs herein had caused judgment by default to be entered against the defendants, defendants presented a motion to set aside the same and to be allowed to file an answer. The motion was granted. Plaintiffs appeal from the order.

[1] The main point presented is as to the sufficiency of the notice as given by the defendants of their motion to set aside the default and the judgment entered thereon. The notice specified that the motion would be made on "Wednesday, the 1st day of July, 1918, at ten o'clock in the forenoon of said day." As a matter of fact, Monday was the 1st day of July, and not Wednesday, and the motion was heard on Monday. Plaintiffs made no appearance at the hearing of the motion, and they contend now that the notice of motion was of no effect because it was indefinite as to the time when the motion would be presented. We think that the notice was a good notice bringing on the motion for the 1st day of July, and that the word "Wednesday" should be disregarded. The mention of the particular day of the week was not necessary to the notice, and a misstatement of that day, where the notice definitely designated "the 1st day of July, 1918," was to our minds immaterial.

[2] The further point is presented that because the superior court by an arrangement of its law and motion calendar segregated causes, and that under such manner of segregation the clerk placed the motion on the calendar for 11 a. m., instead of 10 a. m., as designated in the notice, made its action on the motion of no effect. There appears to be no merit in that contention. The segregation referred to was made by the clerk after the notice of motion was given, and the rule did not require attorneys to ascertain in advance the particular hour of the day at which motions noticed to be heard would be called. A notice that a motion would be heard at 10 a. m. would be sufficient notice to bring the opposite party into court at that time, and, if there was any postponement of the hearing under rule of court, he would be bound to ascertain that fact. No question is made at all as to the sufficiency of the showing upon the application to set aside the default and judgment.

The order is affirmed.

Ex parte DE MARTINI. (Cr. 517.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 27, 1920.)

1. Perjury § 6—False statements by juror on voir dire are perjury.

False statements by one being examined as a juror, after having been sworn to make true answers to questions by court or counsel, constitute perjury under Penal Code, § 118.

2. Habeas corpus § 92(1)—Difficulty of proving offense charged cannot be considered.

On habeas corpus proceedings by one charged with perjury for falsely stating that he would try the case solely on the law and the evidence, the contention that the crime charged was difficult or impossible of proof does not require consideration.

Original application by George De Martini, for writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody under indictment for perjury. Writ denied.

E. R. Vaughn and George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and J. R. Hughes, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, Presiding Judge pro tem. On the 17th day of March, 1920, an indictment was returned in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Sacramento, charging the petitioner with the crime of perjury, alleged to have been committed by said petitioner in said court on or about the 12th day of January, 1920, upon his examination on voir dire as to his competency to serve as a juror in a certain cause then and there pending. Upon such examination the petitioner was asked the following questions and gave the following answers, to wit:

"Q. And if you are chosen as a juror in this case, you will try this case solely upon the evidence produced in court, and the instructions of the court? A. Yes, sir. Q. Nothing outside of the case—that is, outside of the evidence and the instructions of the court—will enter into your deliberations when you go into the jury-room? A. No, sir."

The indictment then sets forth allegations such as are required in charging the crime of perjury—the falsity of the answers, the knowledge thereof of the petitioner, etc.

[1] The petitioner contends that the indictment charges no public offense and that perjury cannot be predicated upon false statements given by a prospective juror, or upon his voir dire examination. The argument in support of this contention is based upon the cases having to do with promissory oaths. By section 118 of the Penal Code it is provided that—

"Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly before any competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any of the cases in which such an oath may by law be administered, willfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury."

The petitioner in this case had administered to him an oath in substance as follows:

"That you will true answers make to such questions as may be propounded to you by court or counsel touching your competency to act as a trial juror in the cause now pending," etc.

This oath is in substance, if not in form, the same oath that is administered to a witness testifying in either civil or criminal causes pending in any of the courts of the state. The crime charged to have been committed by the petitioner was not after having been "sworn to well and truly try the cause and a true verdict render according to the law and the evidence," etc., but when he was sworn to tell the truth. The misapprehension in this case arises from the failure to draw the distinction between the two oaths. The oath of the juror to well and truly try a cause is admittedly promissory in its nature, but the oath of a prospective juror on his voir dire examination binds him, under the pains and penalties of perjury, to truthfully answer the questions that may be propounded to him by either court or counsel.

The language of section 118 of the Penal Code is certainly broad enough to include the offense of perjury when committed by a prospective juror upon his voir dire examination, and to hold otherwise would certainly be to open the door wide to all forms of collusion in the selection of jurors, if false answers knowingly and corruptly made under such circumstances can be given with impunity. In Hilliard v. State, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 648, a prospective juror was held to have committed perjury upon giving a false answer to the following question:

"Have you formed or expressed any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant?"

In that case the oath administered upon voir dire was practically the same as administered in the case now under consideration. In State v. Howard, 63 Ind. 502, it was held that an indictment for perjury might be predicated upon alleged false swearing given by the defendant while being examined under oath as to his competency to sit as a juror on the trial of a cause. To the same effect is the case of Finch v. United States, 1 Okl. 396, 33 Pac. 638.

It does not appear that this question has heretofore been expressly decided by the Supreme or Appellate Courts of this state. In the case of Ex parte Meyer, 40 Pac. 953¹ the petitioner was held to answer upon a charge of having falsified his oath under similar circumstances but the question of whether perjury could or could not be so committed was not decided. The petitioner was discharged for other reasons.

[2] The contention that the crime charged is difficult or impossible of proof does not seem to require any consideration upon this proceeding. Being of the opinion that the charge of perjury may be based upon false swearing by a prospective juror upon his voir dire examination and that for the purposes of this petition the indictment herein is in all other respects sufficient it follows that the writ prayed for herein should be denied; and it is so ordered and the petitioner remanded.

DOLAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 3442.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 28, 1920.)

1. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 337—Motion to vacate for inadvertence must be filed under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

A motion to vacate a judgment because entered through inadvertence cannot be made under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, allowing motion to vacate because the conclusions of law were not consistent with nor supported by the findings, but such motion must be made under section 473, permitting relief from judgments entered through inadvertence or excusable neglect.

2. Courts $\hookrightarrow$ 114—Can correct record by entry of order nunc pro tunc.

The court can always correct its minutes so that they shall speak the truth, and therefore can enter nunc pro tunc an order submitting motion for new trial which was inadvertently not entered on the day made.

3. New trial $\hookrightarrow$ 155—Order held to show granting on date of entry which was too late, and not date nunc pro tunc, which was in time.

On order, reciting that the submission of the motion for new trial was inadvertently not entered, and further ordering that the motion be granted, and that the order granting it be entered as of a prior date, shows that the order granting the motion was made on the date of the order, not on the prior date stated for its entry, so that it was too late, where more than three months had elapsed from notice of judgment, and the motion must be deemed denied under Code Civ. Proc. § 660.

4. Certiorari $\hookrightarrow$ 58—Affidavits contrary to record cannot be considered.

On certiorari to review an order granting new trial, which showed it was made too late, an affidavit of counsel that the order was in fact made on an earlier date cannot be considered, where the respondent court and judge stand upon the order, especially where another order, made at the same time, shows that the new trial was granted on that date, and not on an earlier date.

5. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 397—Cannot without notice set aside for inadvertence order of vacation previously entered.

A court cannot without notice to the parties, set aside on the ground of inadvertence an order previously made, which granted a motion to vacate a judgment.

6. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 397—Vacating because conclusions are not supported by findings without new judgment is void.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 663, authorizing the court to vacate a judgment because the conclusions of law are not supported by the findings or are inconsistent with the findings, and requiring entry of a proper judgment, an order granting a motion to vacate a judgment on that ground, but containing no direction for a new judgment, is void.

7. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 340—Void order can be set aside whenever it comes before court.

A void order can be set aside whenever it comes before a court.

Application for certiorari by Margaret Catherine Dolan against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. George A. Sturtevant, Judge thereof, and another, to review orders granting a new trial and vacating a judgment. Orders annulled.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Jos. L. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BRITAIN, J. The petitioner, wife of William Lawrence Dolan, joined as one of the respondents here, was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. By the decree certain provision as made for the maintenance of four minor children, and certain community property was set aside to the wife. The decree also determined that other real property, the title to which it is averred stood of record in the name of the wife, was her separate property. The decree was made and entered on November 14, 1919, and thereafter on November 28, 1919, notice of motion for new trial was served and filed. On the same day a single notice of motion to vacate the judgment was served. Two grounds were specified, the first being that the conclusions of law were not consistent with, nor supported by, the findings; and the second, that the findings were signed inadvertently, in that they were not first presented to the defendant or his counsel.

[1] A motion to vacate the judgment, based on the first ground, was permissible under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Those sections do not provide for setting aside a judgment on the ground of inadvertence. Relief from judgments entered through inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect must be sought by a motion made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The record here does not show what the moving papers were, nor what showing was made when the motions were presented.

Both motions, together with a cross-motion for additional attorney's fees, were presented to the court on January 30, 1920, the case having been transferred from the department of the superior court in San Francisco, where it was first tried to another department presided over by a different judge.

The minute order made on January 30, 1920, did not mention the presentation or submission of the defendant's motion for a new trial. It stated that the defendant's motion to vacate the judgment was submitted and taken under consideration, and that the plaintiff's motion for counsel fees was similarly submitted. On February 13, 1920, a minute entry was made. It recited that, the court having considered and being fully advised concerning defendant's motion to vacate the judgment, it is ordered that the motion be granted as to the property rights of the parties. If the court had considered that motion as one made pursuant to section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure on the ground of inadvertence in the signing of the findings, the order would necessarily have set aside the entire judgment. Since it was limited to that portion of the judgment relating to the property rights, it must have been considered by the trial court as having been made under sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is to be noted that this order did not direct the entry of any other judgment. It was also ordered that plaintiff's motion for counsel fees be denied. There was no reference to the motion for new trial.

On February 25, 1920, two minute orders were made, the first reading:

"It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the order heretofore made herein on the 30th day of January, 1920, to wit, submitting the defendant's motion for a new trial having been inadvertently not entered, it is by the court ordered that the entry of said order be made this day nunc pro tunc, as of the 30th day of January, 1920. And it is further ordered that said defendant's motion for a new trial be, and the same is hereby, granted as to the property rights of the said parties to the said action, otherwise said defendant's motion stands denied, and it is further ordered that said order be entered this day nunc pro tunc as of February 13, 1920."

[2] The first clause of this order was clearly within the power of the court, which may always correct its minutes so that they shall speak the truth. Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 Pac. 194.

[3] Assuming that there was a mere ministerial inadvertence in omitting the order of submission of the motion for a new trial, it does not appear that the judicial function of determining that motion was exercised in any way until February 25, 1920. This was more than three months after the service of notice of the entry of the judgment on November 19, 1919. The failure of the court to determine the motion for a new trial before the expiration of the statutory period had the effect of a denial of the motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 660; Estate of Waters (Sup.) 185 Pac. 951; San Francisco, etc., Rys. v. Superior Court, 172 Cal. 544, 157 Pac. 604.

[4] It is stated in the affidavit of the attorney for the respondent, Dolan, that on February 13, 1920, the court made and gave its order granting the motion for a new trial as to the property rights of the parties. This statement contradicts the order of February 25. If the trial court in fact made the order granting the new trial on February 13, and by the later order sought only to correct the inadvertence of the clerk, it would no doubt have said so, as it did in regard to the order of submission, and it would not in terms and by the most apt language have made a new order granting a new trial, nor ordered the new order to be entered nunc pro tunc. On certiorari this court is bound by the record, particularly when, as here, the respondent court and judge stand upon it. City of Los Angeles v. Young, 118 Cal. 295, 50 Pac. 534, 62 Am. St. Rep. 234; Borchard v. Board of Supervisors, 144 Cal. 14, 77 Pac. 708. Upon the record before this court it is concluded that the order of February 25 in so far as it purported to grant a new trial on certain issues was beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court and void. The motion for a new trial was terminated by the expiration of the time limited for its consideration.

What has been said concerning the ineffectiveness of the affidavit to contradict the record certified gains force in considering the effect of another order made on February 25. It is as follows:

"It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the order heretofore made and entered on the 13th day of February, 1920, to wit, granting the defendant's motion for an order vacating the judgment and decree heretofore entered herein, and based on the findings of fact made by said court as to the property rights having been inadvertently made, it is by the court ordered that said order be, and the same is hereby, vacated and set aside, and it is further ordered that said defendant's motion * * * be and the same is hereby denied, and it is further ordered that said order be entered this day nunc pro tunc as of February 13, 1920."

A reading of this order in connection with the order purporting to grant a new trial can leave no doubt upon the question concerning what orders were made on February 13, nor that when the court reconsidered them on February 25 the judge concluded and quite clearly stated that he made the order vacating the judgment, and did not make the order granting a new trial on February 13, although he may have intended to do just what he attempted to do on February 25.

[5] Because of the action of the trial court in making the order purporting to vacate the order setting aside the judgment in part, it is deemed proper for the information of the trial court and of counsel to state the views of this court in regard thereto, in order that there may be no misconception of the effect of this decision. The second order purporting to set aside the order vacating the judgment was invalid if the first order be considered as having any effect. Assuming the validity of the first order, it was subject only to be set aside on appeal or under proper proceedings under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. After a court has acted judicially it may not seek to correct its own errors by changing its judgments and orders without notice to the parties affected. Such action would very shortly deprive all judgments of their character of finality. Lang v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 491, 12 Pac. 306, 416; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 174; Holtum v. Grief, 144 Cal. 521, 78 Pac. 11; United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 760, 151 Pac. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199; Gill v. Peppin, 182 Pac. 815. If the order was improvidently made, upon a proper showing and on notice it may be set aside, but the court cannot without notice and upon no showing justify a review of its own judicial act by a mere recital that it made the first order inadvertently. In this case there does not appear to have been either notice given the petitioner of the contemplated action of the court or any showing of inadvertence other than that the trial court determined on second thought that it was in error when it first acted. If the first order was a valid exercise of the power of the court, under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure the second order was beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

[6] The validity of the order vacating the judgment depends upon whether or not it is within the powers defined in sections 663 and 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure. Without the decision it is impossible to determine whether this objection to the judgment was well taken or not, and in support of the action of the trial judge, for the present purpose it must be assumed that it was. It does not follow, however, that the order vacating the judgment was within the jurisdiction of the trial court. Section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a judgment may be set aside and another and different judgment entered when the findings do not support the conclusions of law, and, that when the judgment is set aside, the conclusions of law shall be amended and corrected. Code Civ. Proc. § 663. The notice of motion is required to specify the particulars in which the conclusions of law are not consistent with the findings, and an order granting the motion may be reviewed on appeal. Code Civ. Proc. § 663a. These Code provisions are consistent with the rule that litigation must not be piecemeal. If the original judgment is correct, the party in whose favor it was is entitled to have it enforced, and if it is not supported by the findings, the other party is entitled to have another and correct judgment entered. In either case the loser is given the right of appeal. The Code sections do not permit two motions to be made, nor two orders, one setting aside the judgment, and another at a later day directing the entry of a different judgment. If on the motion it appears to the court that the findings require the judgment to be set aside, it must also appear what conclusions of law should be made on the facts, and the only order within the power of the court under these circumstances is one setting aside the judgment and directing as a part of the same order the entry of another judgment. It is from such an order only that an appeal is provided. An order merely setting aside the judgment and leaving the case undetermined is void and not merely erroneous. Any other rule might lead to interminable delays and the loss of important rights by litigants. On such a motion the court has no power to consider or determine any matter except what judgment should be entered upon the facts as found. Swift v. Occidental, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 166, 74 Pac. 700; Dahlberg v. Girsch, 157 Cal. 325, 107 Pac. 616; Hole v. Takekawa, 165 Cal. 372, 142 Pac. 445.

[7] A void order may be swept aside whenever it comes before a court, and the order vacating the judgment without directing what judgment should be entered was such an order. Upon the present state of the record the original judgment stands unaffected by the subsequent proceedings, unless it be modified or set aside on appeal or in some other way permitted by the statutes.

The order granting the new trial and the order vacating the judgment respectively are annulled.

KINDERMAN v. SHIPLEY. (Civ. 2678.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1920.)

1. Judgment $\S$ 714(3)—Judgment for landlord in action defended on ground of breach of lease held conclusive.

Judgment for landlord in action for one month's rent in which tenant defended on ground that landlord had wrongfully closed up entrance, thereby breaching lease and entitling tenant to vacate premises, was conclusive in subsequent action for accrued rentals under such lease, in which tenant pleaded the closing up of such entrance as a defense and by way of counterclaim for damages.

2. Judgment $\S$ 714(1)—Judgment conclusive in subsequent action between same parties involving same question.

A former judgment between the same parties is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all other actions involving the same question.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 766—On appeal under alternative method failure to print portions of record held not to warrant dismissal of appeal.

On appeal under the alternative method, appellant's failure to print in her brief or in a supplement thereto such portions of record as she desired to call to the court's attention did not warrant dismissal of the appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 953c, as amended by St. 1919, p. 261, since court finds it preferable to examine the typewritten record rather than require a supplement to be prepared.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis Myers, Judge.

Action by S. Kinderman against Virginia Shipley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. V. Chavez, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. J. Wilson, L. A. Lewis, and Haas & Dunigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from the defendant $940 accrued rentals under a lease by plaintiff to defendant of a rooming house in the city of Los Angeles. Defendant admitted the execution of the lease, and that the rental was unpaid, but denied liability, and sought to recover damages upon her counterclaim. The defense and cross-action is based upon the alleged fact that after the execution of the lease for a term of years the plaintiff closed up one of the main entrances to the premises from the public street, thus greatly reducing the value of the use of the premises, and destroying the profits of defendant's leasehold.

On the trial before a jury the court instructed the return of a verdict for plaintiff, and against the defendant on her counterclaim, upon the introduction of the judgment roll in a former action between the same parties, upon the same lease, and in which the same facts were pleaded by way of defense, with findings and judgment against the defendant.

The sole question presented on this appeal is as to the correctness of the holding of the trial court that the issue of fact raised by defendant's answer and cross-complaint was res judicata.

The former action was brought in a justice's court to recover one month's rent under the lease for the sum of $90. Judgment was against the defendant, who appealed to the superior court, and a trial de novo was there had. The issue raised by the answer was pleaded as follows:

"(2) Defendant, further answering and for defense herein, alleges that at the time said agreement was entered into and she took possession of said premises from North Main street, which was the main entrance to the same, the same being designated as No. 337 No. Main street, as set out in said agreement, which fact was the reason for defendant entering into said agreement, but that after defendant had so entered into said agreement and had taken possession of said premises, and against the will and protests of said defendant, said entrance was wrongfully closed up and taken out by plaintiff or his lessor, which was a breach of the conditions of said agreement, and said entrance was made into a store on the ground floor and rented to other parties.

"(3) That the defendant depended and relied in entering into said agreement entirely upon the fact that the said premises had said entrance to said Main street; the other entrance to same to New High street being obscure and in the rear of said building.

"(4) That by reason of said Main street entrance having been so abandoned and taken out, the said agreement became forfeited, inoperative, and void, and the defendant became greatly damaged, and the said premises became entirely worthless and ruined and worthless for the purpose for which the same were leased, and that by reason thereof defendant did, and was compelled to vacate and surrender the same to plaintiff."

In its decision against defendant the superior court found that prior to the negotiations of the lease in question there had been an entrance to the premises in question as alleged by defendant, but that during the negotiations leading up to the execution of the lease such entrance to the premises was being closed, and that certain employes of the plaintiff were engaged in closing up this entrance and removing the stairway leading from Main street into the said premises; that prior to the time of the execution of said lease the entrance had been closed and abandoned, and the stairway removed; that in the execution of the lease the parties to the lease, being the plaintiff and defendant, contemplated and understood that there was to be no entrance to said premises from Main street; and that at the time the lease was executed and defendant entered into possession of the premises there was no entrance from Main street. The court further found that the allegations of paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of the answer herein set forth were untrue, and that the defendant, with full knowledge that said entrance did not exist, and for the purpose of ratifying the lease, caused the lease to be acknowledged, and thereafter placed it of record in the records of Los Angeles county. The defendant thereafter abandoned the premises and defaulted in all further payments of rent, and this action was brought some two years later by the plaintiff to recover damages in the sum of $940 for breach of the covenant to pay rent. The defendant, by way of defense and counterclaim, set up, in substantially the same language as in the defense to the former action, the facts there alleged as to the existence and subsequent closing of the Main street entrance, and claimed damages in the sum of $17,700.

[1, 2] We think it is clearly apparent that the defendant is estopped by the former decree and judgment from setting up this defense and cause of action on counterclaim. It is true that the relief sought here by defendant is not precisely the same as in the former action, but the right of defendant to relief depends upon precisely the same issue of fact that was tried in the former case and determined adversely to defendant's contention. The question of debarring defendant's right to plead a counterclaim in the present case because of not having presented such claim in the former trial is not involved. It is merely that the issue of fact which she now relies upon for her defense and recovery of damages has heretofore been tested and adjudged untrue in a trial by a competent court between the same parties; and the law declares that as between the parties that question was settled once for all. "A former judgment between the same parties is conclusive not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all other actions involving the same question." Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 177, 68 Pac. 597; Southern Pac. Co. v. Edmunds, 168 Cal. 418, 143 Pac. 597; Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 331, 165 Pac. 935; Koehler v. Holt Mfg. Co., 146 Cal. 337, 80 Pac. 73. The last case cited is particularly in point on the issue here.

[3] Respondent calls attention to the fact that this appeal is brought under the alternative method, and that the appellant has failed to print in her brief or in a supplement thereto such portions of the record as she desired to call to the attention of the court. Such omission, under the amendment of 1919 to section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, does not permit of a dismissal of the appeal; and we find it preferable to examine the typewritten record rather than require a supplement to be prepared.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COTA. (Cr. 702.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 27, 1920.)

1. Criminal law — 535(2)—Evidence aside from confession held to show entry in night-time.

Evidence that the entry was effected between 8 in the evening and 8 the following morning, and that accused at 11 in the evening had property in his possession similar to that taken, held sufficient to establish the corpus delicti of burglary in the first degree, so that defendant's admission that he committed the crime between 10 and 11 in the evening was competent.

2. Criminal law — 1172(6)—Instruction allowing conviction of burglary on proof of intent not charged in indictment held not prejudicial.

In the prosecution for burglary in the first degree, an instruction defining burglary in the language of Pen. Code, § 459, as entry with intent to commit larceny or any felony was not prejudicial, though the information charged entry to commit larceny only, where there was no evidence to show intent to commit any other felony than larceny.

3. Burglary — 46(1)—Instruction as to first degree burglary held correct.

An instruction that the information charged burglary in the first degree, that before jury could convict they must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that he was guilty as charged in the information, and that they could not convict of burglary in the second degree was a carefully drawn instruction for the protection of defendant's rights, of which he cannot complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Joe E. Cota was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. P. Butcher, Jr., of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction had upon an information wherein he was charged specifically with the commission of the crime of burglary in the first degree.

The subject of the theft was a quantity of liquor, consisting of wine and whisky contained in bottles and demijohns, taken from the wine cellar, the door of which was locked, which cellar was situated in the basement of a residence owned by Mr. Gould, entry to which was had by the breaking of a window and the lock on the door of the wine cellar.

One of the essential elements of the crime charged is that it was committed in the nighttime, which in this case was the time between the hour of sunset at 4:54 p. m. on December 2d and the hour of sunrise at 6:46 a. m. on December 3d.

[1] Evidence of statements made by the defendant wherein he admitted his participation in the crime, which, he stated, was committed between 10 and 11 o'clock p. m. on the night of December 2d, was received over defendant's objection, and this ruling is assigned as error. His contention is that the reception thereof was not preceded by proof of the corpus delicti, namely, that the crime was committed in the nighttime, and without which the evidence was not admissible. People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, 146 Pac. 890; People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 651, 63 Pac. 1001; Gray v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 380, 47 Am. Rep. 733. Conceding that it devolved upon the people to show by independent evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that the specific crime charged was committed (People v. Smith, 136 Cal. 207, 68 Pac. 702), as a condition of admitting the confession in evidence, we think such fact was established. It was made to appear by testimony of the caretaker of the place, who lived in a house about 100 yards from the Gould residence, that the crime was committed between the hours of 8 o'clock p. m., December 2d, and shortly before 8 o'clock a. m., December 3d, at which latter time he discovered the broken window to the basement, together with the fact of the theft, and, following tracks leading from the window, he found in a hedge of trees a number of bottles containing liquor, which bottles were similar to those contained in the cellar. On the night of December 3d the sheriff stationed himself near the cached liquor, and about 10:30 o'clock defendant appeared with a sack under his coat, when he was arrested. It also appeared from the testimony of another witness that between 10 and 11 o'clock on the night of December 2d the defendant, accompanied by another party, came to his house and left some demijohns of whisky, which demijohns were identified as being similar to those which the caretaker had assisted in taking to the basement of the residence, in addition to which the caretaker testified in direct terms that the entry was made and the goods taken between sunset and sunrise; and, conceding that his evidence upon this point was shaken by his testimony on cross-examination to the effect that he was not out of his house, some hundred yards from the residence so entered, between the hours of 8 o'clock p. m. and 8 o'clock a. m., on said days, and there was an interval of an hour and a quarter of daylight, nevertheless we think the evidence and the inferences fairly deducible therefrom were sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the offense was committed as charged. People v. Stevens, 68 Cal. 113, 8 Pac. 712; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 Pac. 920. This being true, it follows that the court did not err in admitting the evidence of defendant's confession, which, if true, shows conclusively that he was guilty of the commission of the crime.

[2] In defining burglary, the court, in its instruction, used the language of section 459, Penal Code, that—

"Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine, or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary."

Appellant argues that by this instruction, notwithstanding the charge in the information was that of entering the house with the intent to commit larceny only, the jury was authorized to convict defendant if they found he had entered the house with intent to commit any felony, and hence it was error. People v. Mulkey, 65 Cal. 501, 4 Pac. 507; People v. Young, 65 Cal. 225, 3 Pac. 813; Williams v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 2, 108 S. W. 371. Conceding this to be true, nevertheless, for the reason that no evidence other than that pertaining to the offense charged was offered, defendant could not have been prejudiced by reason of the error.

[3] The court instructed the jury that—

"The information charges burglary in the first degree, and before you can convict the defendant you must be satisfied from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty as charged in the information, to wit, of burglary in the first degree, committed at the place charged in the information and between sunset on December 2, 1919, and sunrise on December 3, 1919. You cannot in this case render a verdict of burglary in the second degree."

It would be difficult to conceive of an instruction prepared with greater care, and having for its purpose the protection of defendant's rights, than the one quoted; and it is impossible to understand, even in the light of appellant's argument, any ground whatsoever for the attack thereon.

Other alleged errors predicated upon rulings of the court in permitting the district attorney, over defendant's objection, to ask leading questions of one witness, and its rulings in admitting hearsay testimony as to ownership of the house where the crime was committed, and also error predicated upon assignments of misconduct of the district attorney in his argument of the case to the jury, are not of sufficient merit to warrant consideration.

As a whole, the character of the evidence presented by the record is such that the jury could not properly have reached a verdict other than that rendered, and no errors are shown which could possibly have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Section 4½, art. 6, Const.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNIVERSAL FILM MFG. CO. v. KERRIGAN. (Civ. 3151.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 29, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⇨ 123—New trial ⇨ 163 (2)
—Judgment held essential as basis for appeal; grant of new trial as to damages vacates judgment.

In an action for breach of contract for personal services, where a motion for new trial was granted as to issues presenting the amount of damages and denied as to all other issues, an appeal by defendant from the whole of the judgment, except the portion vacated by the order granting a new trial, will not lie; the order for retrial as to damages necessarily setting aside the judgment, so that there was no basis for appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company against J. Warren Kerrigan. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Ray L. Chesebro and Edward Winterer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for breach of contract to render personal services. Defendant denied that he entered into the alleged contract; also denied the alleged breach of contract, and denied that plaintiff was damaged thereby. There were further issues, including those presented by cross-complaint and the answer thereto. After entry of judgment against defendant for a stated amount, the defendant gave notice of intention to move the court "to vacate and set aside the decision and judgment" entered, and to grant a new trial of the action.

that motion having been presented in due course, it was ordered that—

"Said motion for a new trial herein is granted, and a new trial is ordered as to issue or issues presenting the question of the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff; as to all other issues the motion for a new trial is denied."

Thereafter the defendant gave notice of appeal—

"from the whole of the said judgment, except the part and portion thereof vacated by the order of the said court in granting in part defendant's motion for a new trial, to wit," etc.

Although the appeal has been presented by briefs arguing the case on its merits, the court is forced to take notice of the fact that there is no judgment, and therefore there can be no appeal therefrom. The order for retrial of the issue as to amount of damages, necessarily set aside the judgment. This is an action at law, wherein the judgment is single and indivisible, for it consists of only the one order that the plaintiff recover from the defendant so much money. Taking out that recovery, nothing effective as a judgment remains in existence.

In arriving at this conclusion, we have not excluded from consideration those decisions by which it has been determined that an order granting a new trial does not absolutely vacate the judgment until the order has become final. Sherwin v. Southern Pacific Co., 168 Cal. 722, 145 Pac. 92, and cases cited. We also have in mind the amendments enacted in 1915 (St. 1915, pp. 209, 328) to certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the right of appeal from an order granting a new trial, in cases tried as was the case at bar, was taken away, and whereby it was provided that on appeal from the judgment, the court may review any order on a motion for a new trial. Sections 956, 963, Code Civ. Proc.

In this case the defendant has sought to accept the benefit of the order to the extent that it granted him a new trial of the issue as to damages. To that extent the order has become final, for any claim of right to have it reviewed—assuming that any such claim could be asserted by defendant—has been expressly excluded by the terms of the notice of appeal. But it is a necessary incident to the finality of the order, to the extent that it provided for a new trial, that the whole judgment was set aside, because the specified issue could not be tried after judgment and while the judgment remained in force.

It is true that certain findings of fact have been left undisturbed. When the issue selected for retrial has been tried, and findings thereon have been made, and a new judgment entered, the appeal, if any be taken, will come as an appeal from that judgment, and may include a review of the entire record.

The appeal is dismissed.

EDGE v. BRYAN et al. (Civ. 3204.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 1, 1920.)

1. Fraud ☞11(1)—Vendor's representation as to improvements held one of fact.

Representation by the seller of land that gas pipes were already upon or under it held representation of an existing fact within the law of fraud.

2. Fraud ☞11(1) — Vendor's representation land was virgin soil one of fact.

For the seller of land to state that it was virgin soil was to make a representation of fact and not opinion, where, on being asked what virgin soil meant, he stated that it had been a sheep pasture and never cultivated.

3. Fraud ☞11(1)—Seller knowing buyer relies on representation cannot assert it was opinion.

Where the buyer relies on representations of the seller without relying on his own judgment or opinion, which the seller knows, the seller cannot shelter himself under the pretense that his representation was a mere expression of opinion.

4. Fraud ☞20, 25—Reliance on representations and damage thereby essential.

A buyer of land under false representations cannot recover from the seller on their account unless she believed the representations to be true and relied upon them to her damage.

5. Fraud ☞49—Evidence held properly excluded as not within issues.

In an action by the buyer of land against the seller for false representations as to the character of the soil, in absence of allegations setting up the defense, evidence offered by the seller to prove that during a certain period the land which was not under cultivation was covered with barley stubble, held properly excluded.

6. Appeal and error ☞1033(3)—Exclusion of evidence favorable to the other party harmless.

Where evidence offered by defendants and excluded would have supported plaintiff, the exclusion was harmless to defendants, and they cannot complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Hannah Edge against E. P. Bryan, L. T. Bradford, H. H. Cotton, and others. From judgment for plaintiff, the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Butler, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William M. Morse, Jr., and Sam B. Dannis, both of Los Angeles, for respondent Hannah Edge.

Wheeler & Sweet, of Los Angeles, for respondent A. C. Harper.

THOMAS, J. Appeal from a judgment of the superior court by the defendants E. P. Bryan, L. T. Bradford, and H. H. Cotton, entered against them and in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum of $2,669.84. The complaint alleged facts which, if true, would support a rescission of the contract referred to therein and a recovery of damages claimed, if proven. Demurrer to the complaint was interposed, general and special, and by the court overruled. The answer of the defendants denied generally and specifically all the material allegations of the complaint.

The complaint for the relief asked was based upon certain alleged fraudulent representations made at the time of an alleged sale of real property, and which said alleged fraudulent representations, as set forth in the complaint, are as follows:

"(1) That gas pipes were already upon or under said land; (2) that said land was virgin, rich, and arable; (3) that before the completion of the contract of purchase water would be piped by the defendants to every acre of said land; and (4) that before the completion of said contract defendants would build in the subdivision, at a point convenient of access to the land purchased by plaintiff, a warehouse for the storing and marketing of the respective products of said land; that said representations, facts, and promises were a part of the consideration which induced the plaintiff to enter into said memorandum or agreement of purchase."

Then follows the usual allegation that said representations were false, and by the defendants known to be false, specifically specifying the facts supporting this statement. The complaint further alleges:

"That said promises of defendants were false and fraudulent, and were made without any intention to perform the same or to carry out any of the terms of said promises, and for the sole purpose of inducing plaintiff herein to enter into said purchase;" that plaintiff believed said statements to be true; and that so believing she entered into said contract, etc.

It is assumed by appellants, for the purpose of their argument on this appeal, and this assumption is supported by the record, that plaintiff's proof sustains her allegations as to both the representations and the promises. They urge passionately, notwithstanding this fact, that—

"As a general rule it is established that representations, to be actionable, must be of an existing fact or present condition, and not as to future intention," and "must have been made without intention to perform."

There is no legal requirement that all such statements must be false. They also urge that—

"It is apparent, therefore, that the time when the alleged promises of defendants were to be performed has not arrived, because the promises were of things to be done before the completion of the contract, and the contract has never been completed;" hence, no cause of action can be maintained under such circumstances.

[1] If this were the question with which we are confronted we could readily concede the correctness of the contention. Among others of the allegations of the complaint we find that it was represented "that gas pipes were already upon or under the land," and that the land was "virgin, rich, and arable." Certainly, the first of these alleged representations is of an existing fact. It is also one which, according to the evidence and the concession of appellants, was at the time it was made untrue. Plaintiff testified that she did not know what was meant by the phrase "virgin soil." We think it immaterial as to what construction the courts have placed upon, or what definition may have been given by any authority of, the phrase "virgin soil."

[2, 3] There can be no question, we think, when that phrase is construed in the light of the evidence here, but that it was an expression of fact, and not one of opinion; for the evidence shows that the defendants not only said that the land was "virgin," but that, on being asked what "virgin soil" meant, said that it "had been a sheep pasture and never cultivated." To convey the impression that the land was "virgin," under the facts alleged, proven, and found by the trial court to be true, was a representation of a fact, and not an expression of an opinion. Moreover, where, as in this case, "the vendee relies on the representations of the vendor, and acts upon the faith thereof, without relying on his own judgment or opinion, and this is known to the vendor, the latter cannot shelter himself under the pretense that his representation was a mere expression of opinion, when it is discovered to be false." 12 R. C. L. 248. Indeed, we think the general modern tendency is to hold the vendor to a fairly strict accountability for his representations made in connection with such sales as that under consideration here. We have no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the first point urged by appellants.

[4] The second point presented is that, "assuming that the representations were not true, plaintiff must show that she believed them to be true and relied upon them"; while in the third place it is contended that "she must show that she was damaged by them." We are in full accord with appellants on both propositions, so far as this case is concerned. By a mere cursory perusal of the complaint and the evidence as disclosed by the record before us, it becomes manifest that plaintiff not only has alleged, but has brought herself squarely to the place where she is not vulnerable to, the objections raised.

[5, 6] It is next contended that the court erred in sustaining objections to certain evidence offered by defendants, which evidence tended to prove that during a certain period of time the land which was not under cultivation was covered with barley stubble, and as to whether defendants had themselves farmed this particular piece of land. As we have already seen, the answers of the defendants were general denials of the material allegations of the complaint. There was no such issue presented. The issue here was as to whether the alleged false representations had in fact been made. The objections were properly sustained. In the absence of an allegation setting up that defense, the evidence was properly excluded. In any event, to have overruled the objections, permitting the presentation of the proffered evidence, would not have changed the result of this case. On the contrary, it would have supported the plaintiff in her claim, for the reason that the evidence sought to be introduced would have been in direct conflict with defendants' statement that the land in question had never been cultivated. In such case defendants cannot complain.

We concur with the learned trial judge in his observation, when he said:

"In the mind of the court there is not a single meritorious contention on the part of the defendants. No court, in the discharge of its own duty, could permit transactions of the character involved herein to stand."

Judgment affirmed.

Isaac B. Potter and Newman Jones, both of Riverside (Henry W. Coil, of Riverside, of counsel), for appellant.

McNabb & Hodge, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal by defendant. Plaintiff was awarded judgment in the sum of $500 as damages, which he alleged he had suffered because of the burning of a lot of hay. The burning of the hay was caused by fire, which originated on a pole belonging to the defendant corporation, which pole held wires carrying high voltage of electricity. Fire was communicated from the pole to some dry grass, and spread for a distance of perhaps half a mile, finally igniting the hay of the plaintiff. The fire was caused at the pole by a short circuit. Two insulators, which sustained one of the wires, which wire was carrying 33,000 volts of current, broke down, and the current, in its course to the ground and in overcoming the resistance offered by the pole, ignited the top of the latter. The wire did not fall to the ground, but remained suspended. Sparks from the burning pole were blown to the dry grass, with the result first indicated. The record shows no dispute to have been made as to the facts. Plaintiff on his part opened his case by showing the bare facts as to the causing of the fire and the amount of damage done. He called, as one of his witnesses, the superintendent of the defendant company, who testified on direct examination as to the wire construction at the pole which was burned. On cross-examination the witness was asked many questions relative to the care used in guarding against occurrences of the kind complained of; and at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence a motion for judgment of nonsuit was made by defendant and denied by the court. One of the complaints here is that the court erred in denying this motion, because, as urged, the plaintiff had failed to establish any negligence on the part of the defendant. As the substance of all the evidence is before us, and the case presented is one where no actual conflict of testimony appeared, the question as to whether the court erred in its ruling on the motion for nonsuit need not be separately considered. The important point on this appeal is as to whether upon the whole evidence such a case was presented as authorized the court to make the findings, and enter the judgment appealed from.

Before entering into a more detailed statement of the particular facts shown in evidence, it may be stated that the position of respondent is that, having shown the circumstances attending the burning of the pole and the igniting of the grass and hay, he established, under the res ipsa loquitur rule, a prima facie case, and that the evidence of the defendant as to the care used in constructing and maintaining the defendant's lines furnished a case which should be considered as one presenting a conflict, and hence one which the trial court had the sole province of determining on the facts. Such is not the law as we understand it. The presumption which in certain cases is available to a plaintiff as showing, prima facie, negligence on the part of a defendant is one which in its practical application results only in shifting the burden of proof. "When a thing which causes injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the acci-

[1, 2] So in cases where the bare circumstances of an occurrence as to the cause of which negligence is charged are shown, if a defendant by uncontradicted evidence clearly shows that he has used the degree of care required of him in the circumstances, the plaintiff must fail of recovery. In the first place, we think that it is now well established that persons engaged in the business of supplying electric current, the agency involved being a dangerous one, are required to use great care to see that injury to others is not caused thereby. Keasbey on Electric Wires (2d Ed.) § 241. To say that the care required to be used is proportionate to the dangerous agency being handled is to merely state the requirement in different terms. The question we ultimately reach in this case, and the question determinative of this appeal, is as to whether the defendant established by its evidence that it had discharged its obligation by properly constructing, installing and inspecting its power line. The question becomes a matter of law wherever the facts are clearly settled and "the course which common prudence dictates can be readily discerned." Van Praag v. Gale, 107 Cal. 438, 40 Pac. 555. The following cases are also in point: Davis v. California Street Cable Ry. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647; Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Fernandes v. Sacramento City Ry. Co., 52 Cal. 45. Conversely stated, the rule is that if, upon uncontroverted facts, reasonable deductions are suggested, both in the affirmative and negative of the question, then the decision of the court or jury must be taken as final.

[3] We are of opinion that the evidence in this case was clear and satisfactory to the point that the defendant had used that degree of care required of it in the circumstances, and that the judgment entered was erroneous. It was shown in evidence that the "short" which caused the fire was occasioned by the cracking or puncturing of two insulators mounted in series, one of which was attached to the pole and the other to the end of the current wire. The insulators were called strain insulators, and a loop wire was used to conduct the current over the pole and to the continuing wire on the other side, which was in like manner supported. These two particular insulators had been in use for at least four years. The testimony of the defendant was that they were the best known in the market, "the best that money could buy," and were those commonly and generally used by power companies; that the individual insulator had been tested to carry several times the voltage being conducted in the wires at the time; that a patrolman was employed by the company whose business it was to constantly patrol the power lines, and that he had traversed this line about four days before the "short" occurred; that he had not mounted the poles to inspect the insulators, but observed them from the ground to find whether they had become nicked or the wires loosened; that when any such defects were discovered report was immediately made; that insulators sometimes break down in the manner that the particular insulators here used did, and the current become shorted; that if an insulator cracked, the current would short; that it was impracticable to take down insulators and test them, because the current would have to be shut off from the wires and the business of the company interrupted if such were done; that even though an insulator should be taken off and subjected to a special test, it might crack within 30 seconds after being replaced upon the pole; that the fact that the particular insulators had remained in service four years would be an indication they were originally sound and sufficient in insulating properties; that when the "short" occurred which caused the fire the superintendent had almost immediate notice of it by the cessation of power on the line, and that the defect was found and remedied as soon as possible thereafter. The expert witness of the defendant testified that temperature changes would sometimes crack insulators, and that the day on which this "short" occurred was an unusually warm one, the thermometer registering in that vicinity about 117 degrees. The trial court evidently held the view that the law imposed upon the defendant practically the obligation of an insurer, rather than to use great care. In the opinion of the trial judge, which is printed in the record, the judge said:

"And the court is of the opinion that in the construction of its pole line the defendant has used the latest improved insulators and all other appliances known to the business in which defendant is engaged. In fact, it appears from the testimony that the defendant has exercised, not only due care, but the greatest of care in the construction of its line of poles and wires in the vicinity where the fire occurred."

[4] The conclusion indicated by the trial judge is not in accord with modern authority, as will be seen by an examination of the text in Mr. Keasbey's work, above cited; we have already stated the rule in that regard. The evidence, to our minds, clearly establishes without conflict that the defendant had discharged its obligation and exercised the full degree of care required of it.

The judgment is reversed.

JUDNICK v. JUDNICK et al. (Civ. 3293.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 6, 1920.)

1. Execution ☞49—Judgment cannot be sold.
A judgment cannot be sold under execution.

2. Appeal and error ☞115—No appeal lies from order vacating satisfaction entered by purchaser of judgment at execution sale.

Since a judgment cannot be sold under execution, no appeal will lie from an order vacating the satisfaction of a judgment executed by the purchaser at an execution sale; such fact appearing from the face of the record.

3. Appeal and error ☞151(2)—Principals not aggrieved by judgment entered against sureties on stay bond.

Defendants in an action could not appeal from a judgment against sureties on their stay bond, where they were not parties to the judgment on the bond, not being aggrieved thereby.

4. Appeal and error ☞154(4)—Sureties consenting to judgment against them cannot appeal.

Sureties on a stay bond who consented to a judgment against them cannot appeal therefrom.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Mary Judnick against Antone Judnick and others. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and several appeals were taken. Appeals dismissed.

Walter J. Thompson and J. E. Manning, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAİN, J. Motions to dismiss two appeals. On December 6, 1918, judgment was entered in the superior court in favor of the plaintiff and against Judnick Bros., a copartnership, and Steve Judnick, for the sum of $900, interest and costs. Thereafter Antone Judnick, one of the firm of Judnick Bros., appealed from the judgment. Upon motion made on behalf of the plaintiff and respondent, the appeal from the judgment was dismissed by an order of this court on August 13, 1919, on which remittitur was filed in the superior court on October 14, 1919.

One of the defendants, Steve Judnick, on February 26, 1919, paid to the plaintiff $346 for release of one-third of the judgment. While the matter was pending in this court on appeal from the judgment, the defendants, or some of them, caused to be entered on the register of actions in the superior court under dates of July 24th and 28th a statement that a certificate of sale had been filed, satisfaction of judgment filed, judgment satisfied, and docket discharged. These entries were based upon the satisfaction of judgment executed by one Meurice Swim, described as "purchaser at sheriff's sale of judgment." The satisfaction recited that it was by "the undersigned purchaser of said judgment in the above-entitled action at an execution sale of said judgment had upon execution issued out of the superior court in the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, in that certain action wherein Antone J. Judnick was plaintiff, and the said Mary Judnick and Frank Judnick were defendants, and which said judgment was rendered and entered on the 21st day of September, 1918, and which said action lastly hereinbefore referred to was and is known as and numbered 67350 in the records of said superior court." It appears that Frank Judnick was also one of the firm of Judnick Bros. The action in which the present appeals were taken was numbered 88965 of the records of the superior court. Judgment in favor of Antone Judnick and against Mary Judnick was for $16, and the sale of the judgment involved in these appeals was made for the sum of $20.

On December 23, 1919, on motion the superior court made an order vacating and setting aside the entries made by the clerk relating to the satisfaction of the judgment, and one of the two appeals is from that order. On January 6, 1920, judgment was entered against Frank O'Shea and Irvine O'Shea, sureties on a stay bond of April 17, 1918, staying execution on the original judgment.

While the record on these motions is not entirely clear, in opposition to the notice of motion an affidavit was filed by one of the attorneys for the defendants and appellants controverting immaterial matters stated in the affidavit in support of the motions, and no suggestion was made either in the affidavit or in any other way that the record on the motion was defective. On the oral argument counsel for both parties and the court proceeded on the statement that the defendants in the original action were the only appellants.

[1, 2] In regard to the appeal from the order vacating the satisfaction of judgment entered by the clerk, since the only right claimed was by a purchaser of the judgment at execution sale thereof, and this fact appears from the face of the record, the conclusion is reached that the order was not appealable for the reason that a judgment in this state cannot be sold under execution. Latham v. Blake, 77 Cal. 646, 18 Pac. 150, 20 Pac. 417; Carpenter v. Lewis, 119 Cal. 18, 50 Pac. 925. The purchaser at the execution sale is not one of those authorized to satisfy the judgment of record, and this court has no jurisdiction of an appeal from the order vacating the entry of satisfaction.

[3, 4] The motion to dismiss the appeal of the defendants to the original suit from the judgment entered against the sureties on the stay bond must also be granted. They were not parties to that judgment, nor aggrieved thereby, and neither Frank O'Shea nor Irvine O'Shea, against whom alone the judgment was entered, appeal. The judgment against the sureties was in effect a consent judgment, and was therefore unappealable by the sureties. Erlanger v. S. P. Co., 109 Cal. 395, 42 Pac. 31; Oullahan v. Morrissey, 73 Cal. 297, 14 Pac. 864; La Societe, etc., v. Beardslee, 63 Cal. 160. Since the persons against whom the judgment on the bond runs could not appeal, the original judgment debtors could not appeal from that judgment upon the theory that they were privies of the bondsmen.

Both appeals are dismissed.

ESPINOSA v. GOULD et al. (Civ. 3338.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 1, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §616(2)—Affidavits used on motion must be authenticated by judge.

Affidavits used on motion must be identified and authenticated by the trial judge before they can be considered by the appellate court, and the certificate of the clerk cannot take the place of such authentication by the judge.

2. Appeal and error §659(3)—Application could not be made on appeal for order directing preparation of supplementary transcript.

An application by appellant, through a suggestion of diminution of the record, for an order of the appellate court directing the preparation of a supplemental transcript containing matters not brought up by reason of appellant's failure to give the proper notice to the clerk below, must be denied, as such relief, if it can be given at all, must be sought in the lower court.

3. Appeal and error §907(2)—Ruling of lower court assumed to be proper, in absence of evidence on which based.

Where the evidence on which an order refusing to change the place of trial was based does not appear in the record, the appellate court will assume, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the ruling of the court was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by Salvador Espinosa against George S. Gould, Jr., and others. From an order refusing to change place of trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. B. Stuart and C. W. Byrer, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Claude F. Lacey, of Salinas, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order refusing to change the place of trial. Plaintiff, theretofore adjudged to be an incompetent person, brought this action against his guardian and the other defendants, seeking to have the proceedings, whereby he was declared an incompetent, set aside as null and void, and praying for damages in the sum of $20,000 against defendants Manuel Espinosa and R. C. McComish.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, whereupon the plaintiff filed a motion for a change of place of trial, alleging in his affidavit accompanying the motion a belief that he could not have an impartial trial in the county wherein the action was brought, by reason of the alleged bias and prejudice of the people of the community against him, and an alleged personal dislike on the part of the trial judge. The latter filed a counter affidavit, in which he denied any prejudice or bias against the plaintiff, and alleged that he never had entertained and did not feel a personal dislike against him. The motion came on for hearing and was denied; the order of the court reciting, after the introductory portion:

"Documentary evidence is introduced, said motion is submitted to the court for consideration and decision without argument, counsel for respective parties stipulating that the testimony in case No. 6598 be considered as given herein, and the court denies said motion."

[1] The appeal is taken by the alternative method under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The only record brought here is the clerk's transcript, prepared on notice of the appellant. That notice specified, and the transcript contains, only the pleadings, notices, affidavit, and notice of motion by the plaintiff, notice of hearing, order of continuance, counter affidavit of the trial judge, and the order denying the motion for change of place of trial. It is certified to by the clerk of the court but not by the trial judge. It has long been settled, with regard to the affidavits used on a motion, that they must be identified and authenticated by the trial judge before they can be considered by the appellate court. The certificate of the clerk cannot take the place of the authentication by the judge. There is no other way in which the appellant can present to us the affidavits on the motion in question. Waymire v. California Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 398, 168 Pac. 563. There is neither a bill of exceptions nor a transcript of the testimony offered or taken, or of the proceedings as authorized by said section 953a.

[2] The appellant has made application here, through a suggestion of diminution of the record, for an order of this court directing the preparation of a supplemental transcript, containing the matters not brought here by reason of his failure to give the proper notice to the clerk below. Such relief, if it can be given at all, should have been sought in the lower court (Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 113, 110 Pac. 109), and the motion is denied.

[3] What documentary evidence was introduced and used on the motion, or what the testimony was in case No. 6598, does not appear. Consequently we have a right to and will assume, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that the ruling of the court was proper. Patterson v. Rutherford, 179 Pac. 704.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO.
(Civ. 2802.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1920.)

1. Fines §20—State Poison Act conclusive as to disposition of fines, notwithstanding inconsistent provision of charter; "municipal affairs."

Seventy-five per cent. of the fines imposed in the police court of city for violations of the state Poison Act is to be apportioned to the state under an express provision of such statute, notwithstanding charter provision requiring fines collected in the police court to be paid into city treasury, the poison act being conclusive, since it is a general statute defining state offenses and relating to state affairs, and not to municipal affairs, within Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, making city charter of conclusive effect as to municipal affairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Affairs.]

2. Statutes §14(1)—Title of state Poison Act held sufficient.

State Poison Act, entitled "An act to regulate the sale of poisons in the state of California, and providing a penalty for the violation thereof," held sufficiently expressive of the contents of the act under the Constitution.

3. Limitation of actions §34(2)—State's action against city for fines collected in police court is an action upon a liability created by statute.

State's action against a city for a portion of the fines collected in the police court for violations of the state Poison Act was not required to be brought within two years after accrual of cause of action under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, since such action is not on an action upon the obligation specified in such statute, but is an action upon a liability created by statute under section 338, prescribing a three-year period for such actions.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Suit by the People of the State of California against the City of San Bernardino. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Guthrie, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, and G. B. Blanckenburg, of San Francisco, for the People.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff sued to recover 75 per cent. of certain fines imposed upon defendants in the police court of the city of San Bernardino after conviction of violations of the state Poison Act. Judgment was entered agreeable to the prayer of the complaint, and defendant appealed therefrom. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll.

[1] The main contention of appellant is that, by reason of provisions of the freeholders' charter under which defendant city is organized, all fines collected in the police court are required to be paid into the city treasury for the benefit of the city; that the provisions of the state Poison Act in conflict therewith are null and void. This argument is based upon the assumption that in the prosecutions mentioned the collection of fines and the disposition thereof is a municipal affair, and that the charter provisions affecting the matter are therefore of conclusive effect. Sections 6 and 8, art. 11, Const. Cal. The Poison Act is a general statute enacted by the Legislature (see Act 2724, Deering's Gen. Laws), and the offenses defined therein may be designated as state offenses; in other words, offenses which, in their commission or punishment, are not limited to the confines of any municipality. The entire subject-matter of the act relates in no manner to "municipal affairs." Upon the general subject of what is included within that term, see Fragley v. Phelan, 126 Cal. 383, 58 Pac. 923. In Robert v. Police Court, 148 Cal. 131, 82 Pac. 338, it was said, in the concurring opinion:

"The jurisdiction of offenses defined by state law must be regulated by general state law, and such regulations cannot be altered or qualified by any provision of a freeholders' charter. The trial and punishment of offenses defined by the laws of the state is not a municipal affair. Jurisdiction of such offenses may be conferred upon police courts by act of the Legislature, but cannot be conferred by special freeholders' charter, and certainly not in a manner which will impair the operation of general laws."

In Fleming v. Hance, 153 Cal. 162, 94 Pac. 620, it was held that the matter of the prosecution of state offenses in police courts was not a municipal affair, and in touching upon the question of the disposition of fines collected in such cases, the court said:

"The Legislature was not bound to turn this source of revenue over to the city; but its doing so did not authorize it to compel the city to pay expenses not properly chargeable to it."

If the general statute had been silent upon the subject of the disposition of fines collected under its provisions, then it might, with reason, be held that the charter provision giving general direction as to the disposition of all fines collected in the police court would be operative. The statute, however, designates specifically that the fines shall be apportioned 25 per cent. to the city and 75 per cent. to the state board of pharmacy; and this provision, relating, as it does, to a state affair, one in which the people generally are interested, is of superior effect and must control.

[2] The second proposition made by appellant is that the title of the poison act does not satisfy the requirement of the Constitution, in that it is not sufficiently expressive of the contents of the act. The act is entitled, "An act to regulate the sale of poisons in the state of California, and providing a penalty for the violation thereof," and we think is sufficient, under the decisions made in Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251, and Matter of Yun Quong, 159 Cal. 508, 114 Pac. 835, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 969.

[3] Appellant's last point is that the demand for recovery of certain fines was barred by the provisions of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure—the two-year statute. Counsel's position as to this defense would be correct if the two-year statute applied. However, we are of the opinion that the three-year statute is the one to be considered (section 338, Code Civ. Proc.), and that the action is one upon a liability created by statute, rather than upon the obligation specified in section 339.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 3352.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 3, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, July 1, 1920.)

1. Pleading ⚡290(3)—Filing of unverified answer to admission of averments of verified complaint.

Where defendant husband filed an unverified answer to his wife's complaint, seeking to establish title to real property, the averments that the wife was the owner of the property, and that she was induced to convey it to her husband through fraudulent practices, were admitted.

2. Appeal and error ⚡422—Appeal will not be dismissed for defect in notice.

Where, in an action to determine title to real property inquiries were submitted to the advisory jury, and the clerk of the court on return of the verdict made a minute entry, proper in an action at law, and later entered judgment thereon, while the court which followed the advisory verdict thereafter formally entered judgment and decree, notice of appeal, which erroneously stated the day of the judgment as that when the clerk entered his ineffectual judgment, is no ground for dismissal, in view of the error in plaintiff's notice of judgment.

3. Deeds ⚡70(6)—Overreaching wife by husband through violation of the confidential relation is fraudulent.

The least overreaching or misrepresentation by a husband through which he gains the property of his wife is a violation of the confidential relationship, which it is the policy of the law, as evidenced by Civ. Code, §§ 2217, 2219, to uphold, and therefore is fraudulent.

4. Appeal and error ⚡762—Ground abandoned in closing brief need not be considered.

A ground abandoned in the closing brief need not be considered.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⚡244—Husband's paramour, to whom he conveyed property, held to have knowledge of his fraud.

In an action by a wife to determine her title to property which she had conveyed to her husband on his misrepresentations, and which he conveyed to his paramour, evidence held to show that the paramour had knowledge of the misrepresentations.

6. Deeds ⚡75—Failure of wife to specify property in divorce action not ratification of conveyance.

Where a husband by misrepresentations to his wife that he would abandon his paramour induced her to convey to him property and execute a quitclaim deed, the fact that the wife in her subsequent action for divorce did not describe the property held not a ratification of the conveyance as to the paramour, who was a party to the husband's fraud.

7. Deeds ⚡75—Wife's quitclaim deed of property not ratification of former conveyance induced by husband's fraud.

Where a wife on her husband's importunities and promises that he would give up his paramour conveyed to him certain property, and later, on further representations by the husband, executed a quitclaim deed to the property so that he could mortgage it for improvements, held that the quitclaim deed was not a ratification of the first conveyance, which would entitle the paramour to whom the husband had conveyed the property to claim it as against the wife.

8. Equity ⚡66—Requirement that plaintiff do equity held not to require defrauded wife to adjust monetary arrangements between husband and paramour.

Where a wife conveyed property to her husband on his representations that he would abandon his paramour, and instead the husband began living openly with the paramour, so that he was arrested, and conveyed to her the property while he was incarcerated, the wife, on asserting her rights, is not bound to adjust money arrangements between the husband and his paramour, by repaying to the paramour the moneys which she had advanced the husband.

9. Appeal and error ⚡170(1) — Judgment will not be reversed for nonprejudicial error.

Where there was sufficient evidence to support the judgment, it will not, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, be disturbed where from an examination of the entire record there appeared no reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Ethel Keepers Patterson against Clarence Hyatt Patterson and Monnie Blackburn. From a judgment for plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abrahams, P. B. D'Orr, Claude B. Morton, and Frank G. Tyrrell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. P. Jennings, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BRITAIN, J. One of the defendants only appeals from the judgment, by which it was decreed that the plaintiff owned two pieces of property in Los Angeles, with a direction that conveyance should be executed by each of the two defendants of the properties to the plaintiff. Judgment followed the trial in which an advisory jury was impaneled to try the principal issues presented by the pleadings.

[1, 2] The plaintiff sued her husband and the appellant, alleging that she was the owner of the properties designated, respectively, "the apartment house" and "the bungalow" properties, which, by the fraudulent practices of her husband, she had been induced to convey to him, and which he in turn conveyed to the appellant, who, it was alleged, was not a bona fide purchaser without notice. The complaint was verified. The husband's answer was not verified, and therefore under the law it constituted an admission on his part of the fraud practiced by him upon his wife. His codefendant, the appellant, answered, setting up ownership of the properties in herself, and denying substantially all the facts upon which the plaintiff relied for recovery. As to each of the properties specific interrogatories were submitted to the advisory jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and determined in the first instance as a matter of fact, that the appellant was not a bona fide purchaser for value. On return of the verdict, on March 26, 1918, the clerk made a minute entry of what purported to be a judgment, such as would have been entered had the case been one at common law. This purported judgment was formally entered March 30, 1918. On March 28, 1918, judgment and decree was signed by the judge who presided at the trial, reciting that he adopted the findings of the jury. It was formally entered April 4, 1918. On April 5, 1918, the attorney for the plaintiff served upon the attorneys for the appellant a notice that—

"On March 30, 1918, the verdict of the jury and judgment thereon and judgment and decree in favor of the plaintiff was entered by the clerk of the court."

Motion for new trial on the part of Monnie Blackburn was denied, and notice of appeal was filed. The notice of appeal, entitled in the cause stated that Monnie Blackburn appealed "from the judgment heretofore entered herein on the 30th day of March, 1918, and the whole thereof."

On behalf of the respondent it is urged that because the first entry by the clerk was premature and without authority, the notice of appeal was ineffectual. Vallejo & Northern R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238. The clerk's minute entry of March 26, entered on March 30, was not a judgment. The only judgment was that rendered on March 28 and entered on April 4, 1918. The addition of the date in the notice of appeal in describing the only judgment in the case must be disregarded, in view of the notice of entry of judgment served by the attorney for the respondent. A highly technical contention, based on an erroneous statement made in the first instance by counsel making the technical contention, should not be made the basis of a refusal to consider an appeal otherwise properly presented on the merits.

[3] The plaintiff and her husband, at the time of the trial, had been married 18 years. There was one child, a daughter aged 4. They came to California from their former home in 1915. The plaintiff was a woman of considerable means, with which she purchased property in Southern California, including the two properties in suit, and, confiding in the rectitude of her husband, she caused the deeds to be taken in his name. Some time in 1916 they became acquainted with the appellant, and shortly thereafter a meretricious relationship arose between the husband and Monnie Blackburn. In the latter part of January, 1917, because of this condition of affairs, the plaintiff sued her husband to recover her separate property. Upon the promise that he would sever his relationship with the appellant and comport himself as he should as the husband of the plaintiff and the father of their child, he induced his wife to dismiss the suit, and to evidence his good faith he deeded to her all her property. Shortly thereafter he represented to her that he had severed his connection with the appellant, and, promising her that he would have no more to do with the appellant, he impertuned the plaintiff to place in his name some of her property, stating that he thought he was entitled to something, and did not want to feel like a beggar. Relying upon his representations, which the plaintiff alleged were made without any intention on his part to fulfill them, she reconveyed to him the two parcels involved in this suit. The meretricious relationship between himself and Monnie Blackburn was either continued or immediately resumed. Regardless of the admission of the husband of the allegations of fraud made by his wife, the least overreaching or misrepresentation by a husband through which he gains the property of his wife is a violation of the highly confidential relationship which it is the policy of the law to uphold, and is therefore fraudulent. Civ. Code, §§ 2217, 2219; White v. Warren, 120 Cal. 327, 49 Pac. 129, 52 Pac. 723; Jones v. Jones, 140 Cal. 587, 74 Pac. 143.

[4-6] In April, 1917, the plaintiff again sued her husband for the recovery of the two properties, the complaint being based on a charge of his fraudulent misrepresentations. Again he represented that he had entirely given up Monnie Blackburn, and promised that if his wife would let the two properties remain in his name, he would have nothing more to do with the appellant, but would conduct himself as a husband and father should. Although she was advised by her attorney not to dismiss the action, because, as she said, she then "loved him and still loved him," she caused the suit to be dismissed, and a few days later at his request she executed a quitclaim deed, covering the same two parcels of land, to him. Prior to this time they had discussed the improvement of these two properties. It was understood between them that the property should be mortgaged for that purpose. He represented that he could not secure the mortgage without her joining, and, no doubt, for the same reason that operated upon her to convey the two properties to her husband, she executed to him a quitclaim deed. He was thereupon enabled to mortgage the two properties for the purpose they had agreed upon, and the improvements were made. There is no question presented as to the rights of the mortgagees. As between husband and wife the same confidential relationship existed, and his admission of all the facts alleged by the plaintiff carries with it the admission that every act done by him pursuant to the scheme of fraud was tainted by the original fraud. On behalf of the appellant, it is claimed that the quitclaim constituted a ratification on the part of the wife because it was made by her after her knowledge that the husband had not in fact performed his promise made at the time of the original deeds to sever his immoral and unlawful relationship with the appellant. If there is evidence to support the finding of the jury adopted by the court that the appellant was fully informed in regard to all the facts she is bound by the same rule of law which binds the husband.

About November 1, 1917, the plaintiff sued her husband for divorce. In her complaint she described the properties standing in her own name, and did not describe the properties involved in this action. It is claimed that this also amounted to a ratification of the deed fraudulently procured from her by her husband. As against a party to the fraud, this was not a ratification, and while an argument is made in the appellant's opening brief on the ground of estoppel, counsel for the appellant abandoned that ground in their closing brief, and it need not be considered. During Christmas week of 1917, the plaintiff and her husband had a conversation, in which she told him that if she thought he was going to lose the properties, she would step in and save them, presumably by buying the incumbrances, because he had promised that their child should have the property, and that he would make a will in favor of the child. He then told her he would do everything he could to make the property a success, and that their child was to get it. Almost coincidentally with this conversation the two defendants went to Venice, near Los Angeles, and took up their residence in an apartment house, where the husband adopted an assumed name and the appellant passed as his wife. On January 4, 1918, they were arrested, and the husband was confined in the city jail in Venice. On January 7, 1918, while he was still in jail, the husband executed a deed of the apartment house property to the appellant. The present suit was commenced on January 9, 1918, and lis pendens was filed. On January 10, 1918, the husband conveyed to the appellant the bungalow property. At the time of the transfer of the properties the apartment house was incumbered by a first mortgage of over $17,000, a second deed of trust of nearly $4,000, with interest and lien-able claims for materials of about $1,100, and the bungalow property was incumbered by a first mortgage for $2,400 and other indebtedness of $240. The appellant claims that she had advanced the husband certain small sums of money, that she had actually paid to him $10 at the time of the transfer of the apartment house property, and as a further consideration she undertook to procure bail to have him released from the jail. It is practically conceded that she had actual, as well as constructive, notice of the claims of the plaintiff before the execution of the deed of the bungalow property, and the evidence is conflicting as to her knowledge of the various transactions which have been recited. It is claimed by the appellant that there is no evidence of her knowledge, but there is sufficient evidence of facts to warrant the deduction drawn by the jury and adopted by the trial court that the appellant was very fully informed in regard to the dealings between the plaintiff and her husband.

[7] From the frank, if not bold, statement of facts contained in the appellant's brief, which for the most part furnishes the basis for the recitals made above, it clearly appears that the fraud of the husband was the cause of the original deeds being made to him. When he repeatedly importuned his wife to forego her legal remedies and made renewed promises, which he as repeatedly violated, it would amount to a judicial sanction of gross fraud on the part of the husband to hold that, because his wife loved and trusted him more than he deserved to be trusted, she should be held to have ratified his wrong when in his final disregard of every rule of honorable living he so publicly comported himself with the beneficiary of his fraud as to bring about the arrest of himself and his paramour and his own incarceration.

[8] It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the plaintiff did not offer to do equity in her complaint, and the court should at least have required the plaintiff to pay to the appellant the moneys which the appellant advanced to the plaintiff's husband. In other words, that a court of equity, determining on the admission of an unfaithful husband that he had defrauded his wife of her property and had transferred it to his partner in the entire wrong, should, as a condition for the return of her own property to the wife, compel her to adjust the money arrangements between those who had wronged her. This court knows of no rule of equity which requires any such adjudication.

[9] Upon an examination of the entire record, this court is of the opinion that there was no reversible error committed by the trial court, and that there was sufficient evidence to support the judgment. There was no miscarriage of justice within the meaning of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

The judgment is affirmed.

47 Cal. App. 346

PEOPLE v. NUNES. (Cr. 496.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1920.)

1. Mayhem ☞5—Proof of premeditation not necessary.

Under Pen. Code, § 203, declaring that every person who unlawfully and maliciously deprives a human being of a member of his body, or puts out an eye, etc., is guilty of mayhem, it is not necessary affirmatively to show a deliberate or premeditated intent to commit the crime of mayhem, notwithstanding the word "maliciously" might imply otherwise; hence as malice aforethought is not an essential element in the crime of mayhem, proof of premeditation or deliberation is not required, and it is sufficient to prove only the commission of an act from which the law will presume that it was done unlawfully and maliciously; unless the evidence tends to show it was done under circumstances constituting self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mayhem.]

2. Mayhem ☞1—One who unlawfully strikes another, destroying a member, etc., is guilty of mayhem.

If a person unlawfully strikes another, not with the specific intent to commit the crime of mayhem, and the blow so delivered results in the loss or disfigurement of a member of the body of the assaulted party or in putting out his eye, the crime is nevertheless mayhem.

3. Mayhem ☞1—Mere disfigurement of eye not offense unless eye rendered useless; "puts out an eye."

Under Pen. Code, § 203, declaring that every person who unlawfully and maliciously "puts out an eye" is guilty of mayhem, the mere disfigurement of an eye will not amount to mayhem unless such disfigurement results in rendering the eye useless; but an injury of an eye to such an extent that it cannot be used for the ordinary and practical purposes of life amounts to the putting out of an eye, although the injured party can distinguish light.

4. Mayhem ☞5—Evidence held to show that defendant put out his victim's eye.

In a prosecution for mayhem, under Pen. Code, § 203, evidence held to warrant a finding that defendant put out his victim's eye, notwithstanding the oculist testified that it was barely possible a future operation might be beneficial.

5. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Refusal of request covered not error.

The refusal of a request covered by the charge given is not error.

6. Criminal law — 829(3)—Requested instruction on mayhem held not error being covered by charge as given.

In a prosecution for mayhem, where the court stated contents of information and read Penal Code, § 203, declaring every person who unlawfully and maliciously deprives a human being of a member of his body or puts out an eye, is guilty of mayhem, and further instructed that prosecution must prove beyond all reasonable doubt that defendant was guilty of the crime charged in the information which specifically charged defendant with unlawfully and maliciously putting out the eye of the complaining witness, the refusal of a requested charge that the jury must find that defendant put out the eye of the witness, or acquit, was not error, being covered by the charges given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Dan Nunes was convicted of mayhem. From the judgment of conviction and an order denying a motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the county of Sacramento for the crime of mayhem. Upon a trial he was found guilty, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Louis Dulmaine, the prosecuting witness, was engaged as a bartender in a building at the corner of Seventh and L streets in the city of Sacramento; his hours of duty being from 5 o'clock p. m. until closing time the next morning. He was so engaged on the night of June 29, 1919, closed his saloon at 2 o'clock on the morning of June 30th and, about half an hour later, he and two other men started walking up Seventh street toward K. Before reaching K street they met the defendant, accompanied by a woman, approaching them. According to the testimony of the prosecution, at about that time one of Dulmaine's companions was inviting the other members of the party to his house to partake of a chicken dinner. Defendant said, "What's that; what the hell's that about chicken?" and used some vulgar language. Dulmaine turned around and wanted to know "what was the matter with that guy," and asked, "What's it to you?" or words to that effect, upon which defendant struck Dulmaine in his right eye. He was wearing glasses at the time, and the result of the blow was that they were broken and a piece of glass entered the eyeball; the prosecution claiming that thereby the eyesight of his right eye was destroyed.

[1, 2] Section 203 of the Penal Code defines mayhem as follows:

"Every person who unlawfully and maliciously deprives a human being of a member of his body, or disables, disfigures, or renders it useless, or cuts or disables the tongue, or puts out an eye, or slits the nose, ear, or lip, is guilty of mayhem."

It has been held that it is not necessary affirmatively to show a deliberate or premeditated intent to commit the crime of mayhem in order to sustain that charge, notwithstanding that the word "maliciously" as used in section 203 might imply otherwise. In People v. Wright, 93 Cal. 564, 29 Pac. 240, it is said:

"* * * It therefore follows that, as malice aforethought is not an essential element in the crime of mayhem, proof of premeditation or deliberation is not required. But the requirements of the statute in such cases will be fully met by proof of the commission of the act, from which the law will presume, though it be done in pursuance of an intent formed during the conflict, that it was done unlawfully and maliciously—that is, 'with a wish to * * * injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act'—unless the evidence tends to show to the contrary."

In other words, it is held in that case that it is sufficient to prove only the commission of the act, from which the law will presume that it was done unlawfully and maliciously, unless the evidence tends to show that it was done under circumstances constituting self-defense.

If a person unlawfully strikes another, not with the specific intent to commit the crime of mayhem, and the blow so delivered results in the loss or disfigurement of a member of the body of the assaulted party or in putting out his eye, the crime is nevertheless mayhem. See Terrell v. State, 86 Tenn. 523, 8 S. W. 212; Worley v. State, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 172, 175.

The appellant, however, does not seem to question the law as it is above stated, but his main contention is that the evidence fails to show that the defendant did "put out the eye" of the prosecuting witness within the meaning of section 203 in that particular. It is further contended that the court erred to the prejudice of the defendant by refusing to give one of his requested instructions.

[3, 4] We agree with counsel for the defendant that under the statute the mere disfigurement of an eye would not amount to mayhem unless such disfigurement resulted in rendering the eye useless; but we think the jury were warranted in finding, as their verdict implies that they did find, that the defendant by the blow he delivered in and upon the face of the prosecuting witness "put out" the eye of the latter.

Dr. Briggs, a noted oculist, examined and treated the eye of the complaining witness after the injury was inflicted upon the latter's eye by the defendant. He testified on direct examination as follows:

"Mr. Russell: Q. Do you know Mr. Louis Dulmaine, the gentleman back here? A. I do. Q. You have had occasion to treat him? A. I have. Q. For what sort of trouble was that, doctor? A. He came in on the 2d day of July, last, with an injured eye, that had been injured, he said, I think, two or three days previously. There was a penetrating wound of the cornea, penetrating the iris, and a punctured lense; the lense of the eye was punctured, causing cataract; causing the lense to become opaque, which we call cataract. Q. Did you treat the eye? A. I did. Q. What is the condition of the eye in reference to sight? A. The eye is practically blind. He sees light; that is all. He doesn't see objects. Q. The sight, then, is what we call destroyed? A. He is practically blind. Q. He is practically blind in that eye? A. Yes, sir. Q. All that he can distinguish is just light? A. Yes, sir; I think he can—he sees motions that are made past the eye. Q. Is that a permanent injury, doctor? A. Yes. Q. That is an injury such as cannot be cured? A. Well, yes; I can say that his chances of ever seeing any more are almost nil. Q. Now, you say there was a sort of a wound in that eye? A. A puncturing wound, yes; about, I think, a sixth of an inch long, that went through the clear part of the eye. Q. Could you tell from the nature of the wound what that might be caused by, doctor? A. Well, it might be caused by any sharp thing projected against the eye. It might have been a knife wound, a glass wound, or anything else that struck the eye with force enough to cause that kind of injury. It was more like a cut than a bruise. It was a clean-cut wound. Q. That would indicate that force had been used on it? A. Oh, yes."

There can be no manner of doubt that the foregoing testimony, taken alone, unmistakably shows that the complaining witness' eye was put out. If all that the injured party could do with the eye was, as the doctor testified, merely to distinguish lightness from darkness or perceive a motion or movement of some sort made immediately before the eye, the eye was certainly rendered perfectly useless to its possessor. If both eyes were so afflicted, it is very clear that the complaining witness would practically be blind. What the statute obviously means by the expression or phrase, "put out the eye" is that the eye has been injured to such an extent that its possessor cannot use it for the ordinary and usual practical purposes of life.

But counsel for the defendant, in his contention that the eye of the complaining witness was not shown to have been "put out," relies mainly upon the following testimony brought out on the cross-examination of Dr. Briggs:

"Hardly a likelihood of his ever having any use of that eye for visual purposes. * * * I wouldn't say it is impossible for him to get some vision in it. Possibly in a year or two years it may improve; but I think the chances of doing so are so slight that I don't know that it would be worth attempting. Q. But, in your judgment and experience, you wouldn't say that there isn't any chance? A. Oh, no. Q. In other words, there is a chance? A. There is a chance of getting some sight, but so little chance of getting any useful sight that I wouldn't consider it in human events at all possible—I wouldn't say possible—at all probable. * * * I should say he might have a chance in a hundred of getting some useful sight, and I would say that was hardly a probability either; and in the effort to get it, it might do a lot of harm. So it would be a question in my mind whether I would ever advise him to have an operation done with a view to improving the sight; I don't know; I wouldn't say; I wouldn't know, because I would have to see the eye at some other time, in some other condition. I might feel that in a year or two years' time it might be advisable to do an operation upon it. I wouldn't say it wasn't possible, now, in the course of human events, but I think it is improbable."

There is nothing in the foregoing testimony of Dr. Briggs which would justify us in holding that the verdict is not sufficiently supported. The full purport or the effect of the doctor's testimony upon cross-examination is that, while it is not impossible that "in the course of human events" and at the end of about two years an operation could be performed upon the eye which might have the effect of restoring to it some power of sight, still it was not probable that thus such a result could be brought about. Indeed, it would seem to be very clear from the doctor's testimony as a whole that he was at the time of the trial of the opinion that the injury to the eye could not be so amended or corrected as to enable the complaining witness to use it at any time in the future for any useful or practical purpose whatever. At all events, the direct testimony of the doctor amply sustains the verdict, and if there were any statements brought out on his cross-examination which were calculated to weaken his direct testimony in its tendency to show that the eye was put out, it was for the jury to consider and determine what weight they should give his direct testimony when considered by the light of statements made on his cross-examination.

Our conclusion is, as above stated, that the verdict derives sufficient support from the evidence to uphold it.

[5, 6] The instruction referred to above as having been proposed by the defendant and disallowed by the court is this:

"You are instructed that you must find from the evidence that the defendant, Dan Nunes, put out the eye of the complaining witness or you must acquit him."

One of the grounds upon which the court refused to read the instruction to the jury was that the proposition therein stated was covered by the general charge of the court, and this we find to be substantially true. In its initial instruction the court stated to the jury in detail the contents of the information, thus telling them, as the statute describes it, the nature of the charge upon which the defendant was being tried, and then stated that the issue had been made by a plea of not guilty by the defendant to the information. The court also read to the jury section 203 of the Penal Code, upon which the information is based, and told the jury that, to justify a verdict of guilty, it rested upon the prosecution to prove beyond all reasonable doubt that "said defendant is guilty of the crime charged against him in the information." The accusatory pleading specifically charged the defendant with unlawfully and maliciously putting out the eye of the complaining witness. It would seem that the jury would certainly be minus that degree of intelligence which it must be assumed the average person usually summoned to jury duty possesses if it could be said, as a matter of law, that they did or could not understand from the initial instruction of the court that the defendant would be entitled to an acquittal unless it were shown beyond all reasonable doubt that he had put out the eye of the complaining witness. Indeed, the only question submitted to the jury was whether the defendant did put out the eye of the prosecuting witness; that was the single specific charge in the information; and, when told in general language that the charge in the information was required to be established beyond all reasonable doubt to justify a conviction, that was tantamount to telling the jury that, if the people failed to prove by the degree of proof mentioned that defendant put out the eye of the complaining witness, the former would be entitled to an acquittal.

There are no other points submitted here for consideration.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

47 Cal. App. 211

HUMPHRY v. FARMERS' UNION & MILLING CO. (Civ. 2035.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 26, 1920.)

1. Sales —22(4)—Acceptance subject to inspection was not a variation of offer.

Where an interchange of telegrams between the parties had established an agreement as to all other terms of sale, the fact that the last telegram from the buyer stated the sale was subject to inspection on delivery, which had not been mentioned before, does not defeat the contract, since it merely stated a condition which would have been otherwise implied under Civ. Code, §§ 1771, 1785.

2. Sales —22(3)—Withdrawal of offer after telegram of acceptance was filed is too late.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1582, 1583, a telegram accepting an offer of sale took effect on its deposit for transmission, and a telegram thereafter sent by the buyer, canceling the transaction, was too late.

3. Sales —80—Contract held to require payment at place of delivery.

Where the seller had required the buyer to furnish bank guaranty of payment of draft attached to bill of lading, payment was to be made at place of delivery, even though, in the absence of such agreement, the sale f. o. b. place of sale required payment at place of sale.

4. Sales —417—Evidence of value at place of shipment held to sustain judgment for damages.

Though the measure of damages for refusal to deliver goods sold is, under Civ. Code, § 3354, the difference between the sale price and the price in the market nearest the place of delivery, evidence of market price at the place of sale is sufficient, in the absence of proof of a different market price nearer the place of delivery to sustain a judgment for the buyer.

5. Appeal and error —1033(8)—Evidence —84—Error as to damages held favorable to appellant; presumptive evidence of value.

The fact that a buyer in Indiana was buying beans in California for shipment to Indiana is presumptive evidence that the value of the beans in Indiana was higher than that in California, so that error in basing damages on the market value in California was favorable to the seller, and he cannot complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Humphry, doing business under the name and style of the Evansville Commerce Company, against the Farmers' Union & Milling Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, for appellant.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for respondent.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the alleged breach of contract in and by which it was claimed that defendant agreed to sell to it 80,000 pounds of re cleaned pink beans at the price of $6.35 per hundred pounds f. o. b. Stockton, Cal. After trial the court found that the contract was executed as alleged in the complaint, and that the defendant neglected and refused to deliver the beans as therein contracted to be delivered, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $550, and entered judgment against the defendant for that amount. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The contract, if one was made, resulted from certain telegrams passing between the plaintiff and defendant. For a reversal the defendant and appellant relies upon three propositions: First, that the telegrams did not constitute an agreement; second, that the seller was entitled to be paid at Stockton; and, third, that if the place of delivery was Evansville, Ind., damages should have been based upon the price at which respondent could have bought equivalent beans in markets nearest Evansville, Ind., and not at Stockton.

[1] I. We are of opinion that a fair construction of the telegrams leads to the conclusion that the parties met upon a definite proposition and agreement. In the telegram of November 14, 1916, the defendant said:

"Cannot sell at price you name. Can sell eighty thousand pounds pink $6.35 f. o. b. Stockton. Railroad says cannot furnish empty cars promptly. The prospect of shipment getting through unfavorable. Order subject delay and confirmation."

To this telegram the plaintiff on November 15th, replied as follows:

"Answering telegram accept pink $6.35. Must ship during November. Do the best you can."

This was not an unconditional acceptance of the proposition made in the telegram of November 14th, above quoted. The defendant had stated in his telegram of November 14th that the railroad could not furnish empty cars promptly, and that the prospect of shipments getting through promptly was unfavorable, and that the plaintiff must order subject to delay and confirmation. The answer to this telegram was that the goods must be shipped during November, which was not agreeing to accept the beans subject to delay. On November 17th, the defendant, however, telegraphed as follows:

"Eighty thousand pounds recleaned pink beans ready. Car obtainable. Have your bank wire guarantee payment draft with bill of lading."

This was a statement by the defendant in effect that it could ship as requested by the plaintiff during the month of November, because it stated therein, "car obtainable." It was a statement that there would be no delay, and that if the beans were bought they could be loaded at once; but it contained a new proposition, which had not been suggested before, namely, "Have your bank wire guarantee payment draft with bill of lading." On November 18, 1916, the plaintiff's bank, the Citizens' National Bank of Evansville, Ind., wired the defendant as follows:

"We guarantee payment your draft bill of lading attached, Evansville, commercial pink beans at $6.35, subject permission inspection on arrival."

This was a meeting of the minds of the parties upon the same terms and conditions, save and except that the last telegram referred to had in it these words, "subject permission inspection on arrival." The matter of delay in shipment had been eliminated, the request that the bank guarantee payment had been accepted, and all conditions imposed by defendant had been met, qualified by the added suggestion that the beans would be subject to inspection on arrival. It is the claim of counsel for appellant that it never assented to the plaintiff's request that the beans should be shipped subject to inspection; but, as the learned judge of the trial court observed, the law would have added these words to the contract, even if they had not been inserted in the telegram. Section 1771 of the Civil Code reads:

"One who sells or agrees to sell merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, thereby warrants that it is sound and merchantable."

Section 1785 of the Civil Code reads:

"On an agreement for sale, with warranty, the buyer has a right to inspect the thing sold, at a reasonable time, before accepting it, and may rescind the contract if the seller refuses to permit him to do so."

In the case of Newmark & Co. v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 339, 149 Pac. 1064, it is said:

"The purchaser under a contract of sale of a certain quantity of beans is entitled, in the absence of a waiver of the right, to inspect the property sold as a condition precedent to the making of payment, and the seller is not entitled upon the tender of delivery to refuse such inspection and demand payment, and for failure to make payment to declare the contract annulled."

[2] We are of opinion that the telegrams passing between the parties resulted in a contract between them. The defendant's telegram of November 18th, wherein it says, "wire received too late, entire matter is canceled," was sent after the Citizens' National Bank had telegraphed its guarantee of payment of the draft, and after all the terms and conditions imposed by defendant had been accepted, and was too late to prevent the consummation of the contract. The wire accepting defendant's offer took effect on its deposit at Evansville for transmission. Civ. Code, §§ 1582, 1583. It was deposited at Evansville, Ind., before the defendant's telegram of November 18th was sent.

[3] II. Some discussion is indulged in upon the meaning of the expression "f. o. b. Stockton"; it being the claim of appellant that this expression not only meant that the goods were to be placed on the car by the seller without any expense to the buyer, but also that it meant that upon their being loaded ready for shipment the purchase price was then due and payable and at the place of shipment. We deem it unnecessary to examine critically whether the expression "f. o. b." includes, not only loading, but the right to have payment at the place of loading because, even if the expression in general does mean both loading and payment, the parties can contract differently. The telegrams in this case conclusively show that, if a sale were made, it was the understanding of the parties that the goods were not to be paid for in Stockton, but were to be paid for in Evansville, Ind. The telegram of November 17, 1916, sent by the defendant, "Have your bank wire guarantee payment draft with bill of lading," was a clear expression by the defendant that payment was not expected until the goods were received in Indiana, together with the bill of lading, and the guaranty of the Citizens' National Bank in response to the demand for the guaranty, "We guarantee payment of your draft, bill of lading attached," could mean nothing else than that the bank guaranteed that when the bill of lading reached Evansville, together with the draft, the same would be paid at that place, and not at Stockton.

[4] III. Lastly, it is claimed by appellant that if the place of delivery was to be Evansville, Ind., damages should have been based upon the price at which respondent could have bought equivalent beans in the market nearest Evansville and not at Stockton, and this contention is predicated upon the provisions of section 3354 of the Civil Code, wherein, in substance, it is provided that in estimating damages the value of the property to a buyer deprived of its possession is deemed to be the price at which he might have bought the equivalent thing in the market nearest the place where the property ought to have been put into his possession, and at such time after the breach of duty upon which his right to damages is founded as would suffice, with reasonable diligence, for him to make such a purchase.

[5] Respondent introduced evidence tending to show the price at which equivalent beans could have been bought at Stockton, and no evidence of the price at which they could have been bought at any other place was introduced by either party. There is nothing in the record to show that the beans could have been bought at any less price at any place nearer Evansville. The price at which the beans could have been bought at Stockton was the only evidence the court had before it as to the amount the plaintiff would have had to pay for equivalent beans. There is no evidence in the record, either on behalf of plaintiff or defendant, and none offered by the defendant, tending to show what the market price of such beans was at any place nearer Evansville than the city of Stockton. We think, under the circumstances, that the court was justified in accepting the proved price at the city of Stockton as the price at which respondent could have bought equivalent beans. If there was any place nearer Evansville at which they could have been bought, then the matter was entirely open for the defendant to make such proof. It made no attempt to do so. It sufficiently appears from the record that permitting the evidence of the market price of beans at Stockton, instead of confining the proof to some unnamed place east of the Rocky Mountains, was a benefit to the appellant, instead of an injury. The fact that plaintiff was buying beans at Stockton to be shipped to Indiana, and paying the transportation charges thereon, is presumptive evidence that the market price of beans was less in California than in Indiana; otherwise, the plaintiff was unbusinesslike in buying them. The appellant is not entitled to complain of a ruling that resulted in a benefit to it and a smaller judgment than otherwise might have been obtained.

We think the judgment is right, and should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BUSCHMAN et al. v. TURLOCK IRR. DIST.
et al. (Civ. 2199.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses — 227—New construction under Wright Irrigation Act rests on adoption of plans by owners.

The whole purpose and scope of the Wright Irrigation Act, so far as it relates to new construction work, rests on the adoption of plans and the approval of landowners of the district, and does not rest primarily with the directors, who are not empowered to carry on any new work without authorization, so that under section 39 funds can be used by the directors in the prosecution of new work only when previously authorized by voters.

2. Mandamus — 154(4)—Complaint for writ of mandate to compel construction of irrigation ditches defective.

Complaint in action for writ of mandate to compel construction of ditches and delivery of water for irrigation purposes under the Wright Irrigation Act held defective as containing nothing from which it could be inferred that the landowners of the district had adopted plans calling for the construction of other than main and lateral canals or any canals or ditches which plaintiffs seek to have constructed.

3. Mandamus — 154(4)—Complaint must show fund will not be exhausted for various purposes for which raised before application to one particular purpose may be ordered.

The board of directors of an irrigation district being given discretion by the Wright Irrigation Act to raise by a 2 per cent. assessment such sum as the board shall deem necessary for any of the purposes of the act, the different purposes are placed on an equal footing, and it must appear by the complaint that they will not exhaust the fund raised before its application may properly be ordered by the appellate court to any particular project.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action for writ of mandate by C. H. Buschman and others against the Turlock Irrigation District and S. A. Hultman and others, constituting its board of directors. From an order sustaining defendants' demurrer, and from judgment denying the writ, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. C. LeHane, of Los Angeles (Fred C. Peterson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

Griffin, Boone & Boone and P. H. Griffin, all of Modesto, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Presiding Judge pro tem. By this action plaintiffs sought a writ of mandate from the superior court of Stanislaus county, directing the defendants to construct certain ditches and deliver water for irrigation purposes to lands and premises described in the complaint, belonging to the plaintiffs, and situate within the Turlock irrigation district. The matter is in this court upon appeal from the order and judgment of the trial court sustaining defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' complaint.

It appears from the pleadings that the defendant Turlock irrigation district is a quasi public corporation, organized under the provisions of what is popularly known as the Wright Irrigation Act (St. 1887, p. 29, as amended); that for some time past water has been delivered to the lands belonging to the plaintiffs through a private ditch, called the Delmas ditch, the intake of which is at a point on what is called the Ceres main ditch, constructed by and belonging to the defendant Turlock irrigation district; that the water thus furnished through the Delmas ditch is lost, in large measure, by means of seepage, and the natural porous condition of the soil traversed by said Delmas ditch before being distributed over the lands of the appellants. To remedy this defect and avoid the loss of water, a writ of mandate was prayed for, directing the Turlock irrigation district and the other defendants herein to take such action as might be necessary to furnish plaintiffs with sufficient water for the irrigation of their lands; that said water be delivered directly to, or close by, the lands belonging to the plaintiffs.

Though not stated in precise form, the relief sought is, in fact, as follows: That the Turlock irrigation district be required to build a new branch or service ditch from its main canal; that the directors of the district be required to construct said ditch and provide the money for paying the expenses of such construction without any adoption of plans or previous approval by the votes of the landowners of the district. Appellants argue that authority for such an order from the court is found in the last clause of section 39 of the Wright Act relating to the power of the board of directors of irrigation districts, which clause reads as follows:

"Also sufficient to raise such amount not exceeding two per centum of the aggregate value of the lands within the district according to the latest * * * equalized assessment roll thereof, as the board of directors shall determine may be needed to be raised by assessment for any of the purposes of this act."

A correct interpretation of this clause requires an examination or analysis of the various provisions which set forth the power and purposes of the act, and how the machinery thereof is to operate.

Section 15 gives the board of directors power to construct canals, waterways, reservoirs, etc., and to acquire land necessary for such purposes.

Section 30 sets forth that "for the purposes of constructing or purchasing the necessary irrigation canals and works and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor," etc., as soon as the district is organized, and also whenever thereafter a construction fund is necessary, etc., for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of money necessary to be raised, said board shall cause such surveys, examinations, drawings, and plans to be made as shall furnish the proper basis for the amount of money to be raised, which plans, it is provided in section 30a, must be submitted to the commission authorized to approve bonds of irrigation districts. And finally, after the plans, surveys, and engineer's report have been approved, the proposition of raising money by a bond issue to carry on construction work according to the plans, surveys, etc., adopted must be submitted to the voters of the district, as provided by section 30c of said act. In the event that the money raised by bond issues proves insufficient to complete the work undertaken by the district according to its adopted plans, section 34 provides that a special assessment may be levied after the question of so doing has been submitted to, and received a majority vote of, the qualified voters of the district.

Section 67 provides for the creation of certain funds, to wit, a bond fund, a construction fund, and a general fund.

Section 55 specifies that the cost and expense of purchasing and acquiring the property and constructing the works and improvements provided for shall be paid wholly out of the construction fund. (This section includes other items not pertinent to this case.)

Section 61 specifies that—

"The board of directors or other officers of the district shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the * * * provisions of this act," etc.

[1] It thus appears that the whole purpose and scope of the act, so far as it relates to new construction work, rests upon the adoption of plans and the approval of the landowners of the district, that it does not rest primarily with the directors, and that the directors are not, specifically or otherwise, empowered to carry on any new work without such previous authorization. Hence, if that portion of section 39 relied upon by appellants should be construed to authorize the use by the board of directors of funds so raised in any new work, such funds could only be employed in that manner if such new work had been previously authorized by the voters of the district.

[2] There is nothing in the appellants' complaint from which it can be inferred that the landowners of Turlock irrigation district have adopted any plans calling for the construction of other than main and lateral canals, or of any canal or ditch which the plaintiffs seek to have constructed by order of this court. It does not appear that anything more than a general system has been provided for. It does appear, by way of argument in the briefs and the general history of irrigation districts, that different plans have been adopted by the voters of different districts. In some main canals and laterals only have been provided for in the plans, and in others a much more comprehensive system of ditches, calling for the construction at the expense of the district not only of main and lateral canals, but of ditches conveying water to every 40 acres of land susceptible of irrigation, has met the approval of the voters of the district.

The complaint is also lacking in other particulars. It does not appear therefrom what the proposed work would cost, nor whether, if authorized by the district, the 2 per cent. assessment provided for in section 39, if otherwise applicable, would prove adequate to defray the expenses of the undertaking.

[3] There is no means by which this court can determine whether any sum raised by the 2 per cent. assessment might properly be applied to the construction of service ditches, and so order its application, without it being specifically shown that such sum is available. The board of directors of the district are given discretion to raise by a 2 per cent. assessment such sum as the board shall determine may be necessary to be raised for any of the purposes of the act. The different purposes are placed upon an equal footing, and it must appear that the different purposes will not exhaust the fund for which it has been raised before the application of such fund may properly be ordered by this court applied to any particular project.

Considerable stress is laid upon section 18, wherein it is "expressly provided that all waters distributed for irrigation purposes shall be apportioned ratably to each landowner upon the basis of the ratio which the last assessment of such owner for district purposes within said district bears to the whole sum assessed upon the district." We do not, however, agree with the contention that this section either authorizes or commands the construction of either main, branch, or lateral canals or service ditches which have not been otherwise provided for. Its plain import would seem to be that, when the landowners have their lands prepared for irrigation, have their service ditches connected with the system built by the district, then and in that case distribution of the water available for irrigation purposes is to be apportioned ratably, as therein set forth.

Being of the opinion that plaintiffs' complaint does not set forth a cause of action, it follows that the order and judgment of the trial court should be, and the same are hereby, affirmed.

HOGUE-KELLOGG CO. v. BAKER.
(Civ. 2847.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 28, 1920.)

1. Crops ⇐3—Contract for sale of crops to be grown in future valid, where seller has land.

A valid contract may be made for the sale of a crop to be grown in the future by the vendor, where such vendor possesses the land on which the crop is to be grown, for in such case the needful thing out of which the crop is to be produced is in existence, and hence the crop has potentiality.

2. Crops ⇐3—Contract for sale of future crops held valid.

Contract for sale of crop to be grown in the future on seller's land, providing that "this contract is understood by both parties to pass title and constitute absolute sale," held not void as against objection that it contemplated a completed sale of property not in existence; the contract being executory, notwithstanding quoted provision, which merely means that title should be deemed to pass whenever the produce became a growing crop.

3. Crops ⇐3—Invalidity of provision as to title on sale of future crops has no effect on main contractual obligation.

Under Civ. Code, § 1141, declaring when title passes by an executory agreement for sale of personal property, the invalidity of provision, in agreement for sale of future crops, that execution of the contract passed title, would not affect the main contractual obligation to grow and deliver the crops.

4. Contracts ↪10(4)—Contract of sale of future crops held not void for lack of mutuality.

Agreement to sell future crops, for which buyer agreed to pay specified price if delivered on or before certain date, held not void for lack of mutuality, notwithstanding provision giving buyer option, on delivery after such date, to either cancel contract or continue it in force; such provision being a mere statement of legal right of buyer in case of seller's default.

5. Sales ↪411—Buyer, suing seller for refusal to deliver, not required to plead particulars as to general damages.

Buyer, suing seller for breach of contract to grow and deliver crop of beans, was not required, as respects general damages, to specially plead the particulars as to how and why he had been damaged.

6. Sales ↪411—Allegation as to price for which goods could have been bought not equivalent to allegation as to value thereof to buyer.

In buyer's action for nondelivery, allegation as to price for which goods could have been purchased at date of delivery held insufficient as an allegation of value of property to buyer, under Civ. Code, § 3308, providing that the measure of damages in such case is the excess, if any, of value of goods to buyer over amount due seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled.

7. Sales ↪411—Complaint held to state cause of action for failure to deliver.

In buyer's action for seller's breach of contract to grow and deliver crop of beans, complaint, held sufficient, as against a general demurrer, to support a judgment for nominal damages, even if it should be held that matters relating to damages omitted therefrom should have been specially pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by the Hogue-Kellogg Company against J. S. Baker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Ardis and W. S. Knott, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred N. Arnoldy, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff upon an alleged cause of action for damages arising because of defendant's failure to perform the obligations imposed by written contract. The case went to judgment after answer and trial. The only contention made by appellant, however, is that the court erred in overruling his demurrer, which was interposed to the complaint of plaintiff. It is insisted that the complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The contract for the breach of which plaintiff sought damages is set out in the complaint and is as follows:

"J. S. Baker, of Norwalk, Cal., does hereby agree to grow for the Hogue-Kellogg Company, of Ventura, Cal., 20 acres of Henderson bush beans, to be grown during the farming season of 1917 on land situated near Norwalk, Cal., known as Baker ranch, and to deliver the entire crop product thereof. The beans are to be delivered as soon as possible after threshing, properly re-cleaned, free from damage of any kind, in first-class shipping condition, sacked in new bean bags, to be even weighted and so stenciled, f. o. b. cars at Buena Park, Cal.

"The Hogue-Kellogg Company agrees to pay for said beans on net weight at $4.25 per hundred pounds, delivered f. o. b. cars at Buena Park, Cal., on or before December 1, 1917; and in case delivery is not made within the final time limit, it is optional with the Hogue-Kellogg Company to consider this contract in force or to cancel same.

"In case it rains, damaging the beans, said beans shall be handpicked and put in the condition as above stated.

"It is mutually agreed that the Hogue-Kellogg Company will sell seed beans for planting the above acreage at the rate of $4.25 per hundred pounds, f. o. b. Ventura, Cal., payment to be made when the crop is delivered.

"This contract is understood by both parties to pass title and constitute absolute sale, but until delivery has been completed grower agrees to and does assume all risk of loss or damage. Time is the essence of this contract, and any controversy arising under this contract is to be settled by arbitration; each party hereto to select one arbitrator and the two jointly to select a third, the decision of a majority of said arbitrators to be final and binding on both parties."

[1, 2] Appellant insists that the contract was invalid because it contemplated a completed sale of property not in existence, and that it is void for want of mutuality. The third point made has to do with the sufficiency of the allegations in the complaint affecting plaintiff's alleged damages. It is well-settled law that a valid contract may be made for the sale of a crop to be grown in the future by the vendor, where such vendor possesses the land upon which the crop is to be grown, for in such case it appears that the needful thing out of which the crop is to be produced is in existence, and hence the crop has legal potentiality. Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718; Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. 52, 10 L. R. A. 369, 21 Am. St. Rep. 63; Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 311. It was alleged in the complaint that at the time of the making of the contract and subsequent thereto defendant was the owner and in possession of the 20 acres of land referred to in the written contract. We construe the contract to be executory. The mere fact that the writing provided that the contract should pass title and constitute an absolute sale, with a risk on the grower for loss or damage until delivery, should be held to mean only that title should be deemed to pass whenever the produce became a growing crop. It was competent for the parties to so contract. Farmer v. Leaf, 189 Pac. 735.

[3, 4] But, were we to assume that that particular term of the contract was void, it would not vitiate the main contractual obligation imposed upon the defendant, which was to grow and deliver the crop. In that case section 1141 of the Civil Code would apply, which declares that title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale of personal property, when the buyer has accepted the thing, or when the seller has completed it, prepared it for delivery, and offered it to the buyer, with intent to transfer title thereto. There was no lack of mutuality in the obligations imposed by the contract. Plainly its terms were sufficient to have enabled the defendant, had he produced a crop and offered it to the plaintiff, and had the latter refused to accept it, to enforce that term which provides for the payment of the price agreed upon. That term is definitely stated, to wit:

"The Hogue-Kellogg Company agrees to pay for said beans on net weight at $4.25 per hundred pounds, delivered f. o. b. cars at Buena Park, Cal., on or before December 1, 1917."

The condition immediately following, that in the event there was a failure to deliver it would be optional with the vendee to cancel the contract or continue it in force was a mere statement of the legal right of the vendee upon default being made by the vendor.

[5, 6] As to the allegation of damage, plaintiff particularly alleged the making of the contract, the terms thereof, and the breach committed by the defendant; it alleged that by reason of the failure and refusal of the defendant to grow and deliver the beans plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $775, and that the damages had not been paid. It is the position of appellant that the particulars as to why and how the plaintiff had been damaged should have been specially alleged, and in this regard it is claimed that an additional allegation contained in the complaint, which was that at the time when performance was due the price at which the plaintiff "might have bought" the equivalent of the beans agreed to be grown and delivered, and which the land was capable of producing, was the sum of $12 per hundred pounds, is insufficient. This allegation, of course, if that matter was required to be specially pleaded, as contended for by appellant, was insufficient, for section 3308 of the Civil Code declares that the detriment caused by the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property is "the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer, over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled." The statement in the complaint of the price at which the plaintiff "might have bought" beans in the market at the time delivery from defendant was due is not an allegation of the value of the beans to the plaintiff or the market price thereof. But we think the plaintiff was not required to particularly plead the facts as to how the damage arose.

"At the common law, general damages, such as the law presumes to arise, as being the natural and necessary result of the wrong complained of, were not required to be pleaded. Damages for breach of contract to buy or sell goods were within this rule." Riverside Coal Co. v. Holmes, 36 Neb. 858, 55 N. W. 255.

"Under a general allegation of damages a plaintiff may prove and recover those damages which naturally and necessarily result from the act complained of. These damages the law implies will proceed from the act, although the amount may often be in the reasonable discretion of the jury. They are called 'general,' as contradistinguished from 'special' damages, which are required to be specially stated in the declaration." Mitchell v. Clarke, 71 Cal. 163, 11 Pac. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529; Barber v. Calzalis et al., 30 Cal. 92.

[7] A still further answer to the contention of appellant is that, as against the general demurrer, the complaint was sufficient to support a judgment for nominal damages, even though matters required to be specially pleaded were omitted therefrom. McCarty v. Beach, 10 Cal. 461; Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 Pac. 380.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is affirmed.

2. Homestead §43—Declaration not stating declarant resided on premises claimed held ineffective.

Action by Charles L. Olds, in his own right and as executor of the last will and testament of Martha D. Olds, deceased, against Ettie B. H. Thorington and others, and Ettie B. H. Thorington as administratrix of the estate of William R. Thorington, deceased. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. The judgment in this action decreed that plaintiff's title to certain lands situate in Inyo county be quieted upon the payment by plaintiff to defendants of the amount of a mortgage previously given by plaintiff's predecessors covering the lands in question. Defendants appeal. Plaintiff, in his own right and as executor of the last will of Martha D. Olds, deceased, avers in his complaint that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of the disputed premises, and prays that his title thereto be quieted. Defendants in their answer deny the validity of plaintiff's title, and by way of cross-complaint seek to reform a certain deed which forms a part of their chain of title by correcting the description of the property intended to be conveyed, and thereupon to quiet their title, which they aver was acquired by prescription. Defendants also pleaded the statute of limitations. Section 318, Code Civ. Proc.

Plaintiff is the son of David and Martha D. Olds, both of whom are now deceased. Defendants are, respectively, the widow and the children of William R. Thorington, since deceased, the latter being a son of Martha D. Olds by a former marriage. The premises in question were acquired in the year 1874 by David and Martha D. Olds subsequent to their marriage, and are conceded to be community property, upon which David Olds, on August 11, 1881, filed a homestead. On June 27, 1891, said William R. Thorington loaned David Olds and wife $2,500, for which they gave him a note, secured by a mortgage purporting to cover the premises in question. For the purpose of satisfying that mortgage David Olds, on February 24, 1894, executed and delivered to Thorington a deed to said premises. Martha D. Olds did not join in that deed. The mortgage was immediately afterwards satisfied of record. After said deed to Thorington had been executed and delivered Olds and his wife continued to reside upon said premises, until the death of Olds, which occurred on January 16, 1909, at which time Thorington, who had been living with his wife on what is called the "Horton" ranch, moved onto the Olds place, his wife remaining on the Horton place. Thorington then lived with his mother, Mrs. Olds, on the Olds place, keeping house for her, until January, 1910, when he moved back to the Horton ranch to reside with his wife. Thereafter Mrs. Olds resided alone upon the Olds place until the 1st of August, 1913, at which time Thorington, with his wife and family, moved onto the Olds place, and jointly occupied the dwelling thereon with Mrs. Olds. Thorington died on November 2d of the same year, after which Mrs. Olds and the Thorington family continued to occupy the Olds dwelling until the death of Mrs. Olds, which occurred January 17, 1914, and since then Thorington's widow and children have occupied said premises and dwelling.

Three main issues were presented by the pleadings, viz. the validity of plaintiff's title, the right of defendants to reform the deed executed by David Olds to Thorington in 1894, and defendants' asserted title by prescription.

The foundation of plaintiff's title is the homestead declared by David Olds in 1881. If, as contended by appellants, the homestead is void, title to said property was vested in Thorington by the deed executed by Olds in 1894, for the reason that, in the absence of a valid homestead, Olds possessed the power, under the provisions of section 172 of the Civil Code, as that section existed at the time of this transaction, to dispose of the community property, other than by testamentary disposition, the same as he would if it were his separate estate. If, however, said homestead is valid, said deed is inoperative, and the question of whether or not plaintiff's title, acquired under said homestead has been defeated by the asserted prescriptive title of defendants becomes necessary for determination. The matter of the reformation of said deed becomes material only in the event that defendants' title is found to depend upon said deed.

The trial court found specifically on all of the issues of fact presented by the pleadings, from which it evidently concluded that said homestead was valid, and that defendants' title by prescription had not been established, although in its conclusions of law and in its judgment neither of those matters were specifically determined. It found that the description in the Thorington deed was intended to cover the premises in question, but it declined to grant relief toward the reformation of said deed, upon the ground that, even if reformed, said deed "would still be inoperative to pass or convey his title to the lands and premises" in question, and as to defendants' prescriptive title it found that the possession of said premises by Thorington was a joint possession with that of Olds and his wife, and was not an exclusive, hostile and adverse one, and that the only exclusive possession by the Thoringtons had been since the death of Mrs. Olds, which occurred January 17, 1914. The court's conclusions of law and its judgment were, in effect, that by reason of said mortgage and deed Thorington and his successors became mortgagees in possession, and that plaintiff's title should not be quieted until said mortgage is paid. The judgment which follows strictly the conclusions of law decrees that the defendants and cross-complainants are entitled to retain possession of said premises until plaintiff pays to defendants and cross-complainants the sum of $3,297.50, the amount found by the court to be due on said mortgage from Olds and his wife to Thorington, and that upon the payment of said sum said debt will have been fully paid, and plaintiff will thereafter be the owner in fee simple of said premises, subject only to the administration of the estate of Martha D. Olds, deceased, and that upon the payment of said sum plaintiff will be entitled to a decree quieting his title to said premises.

[1] Preliminary to the main questions presented by the appeal, respondent contends that the appeal should be dismissed upon the ground that said judgment is interlocutory in its character and not final. We are of the opinion that the point is not well taken. The form of judgment is one falling within the rule stated in Zappettini v. Buck- les, 167 Cal. 27, 138 Pac. 696, in which it is held that if after a decree has been entered no further proceedings can come before the court, except such as are necessary to carry the decree into effect, the decree is final. Under the provisions of the judgment in this action no further judicial action on the part of the court is necessary to a final determination of the rights of the parties. The amount to be paid by plaintiff before he is entitled to relief has been definitely fixed and determined by the court, and upon said payment plaintiff ipso facto becomes entitled to a decree quieting his title. Nothing remains to be done by the court except to carry the decree into effect, which, as we have seen, does not render the decree interlocutory in its character. We do not consider the case of Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 174 Pac. 657, relied upon by respondent, in point, for the reason that the decree in that case was apparently rendered and intended by the court as an interlocutory decree. Furthermore, the entry of the final decree in that case depended upon the tender of a deed and a certificate of title showing the names and widths of all streets and roads touching the property, which, if tendered, may have given rise to further questions for judicial determination as to the sufficiency of said deed and certificate. The other authorities cited by respondent (Bateman v. Gits, 17 N. M. 619, 133 Pac. 969, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 1192; Elliott on Appellate Procedure, § 83; Freeman on Judgments [4th Ed.] §§ 29, 34) are not in conflict with the views expressed in Zappettini v. Buckles, supra.

The first question presented on the merits of the appeal is the one relating to the validity of the homestead. If the homestead is void plaintiff has no title upon which to base his action. Several objections are urged against its validity, the most important of which is that the declaration contains no statement that the person who makes it is residing on the premises claimed as a homestead. A copy of the declaration of homestead is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, David Olds, of Round Valley, county of Inyo, state of California, a married man and the head of a family, residing with my family on the northwest one quarter section twenty-eight, township six south, range thirty-one east, do hereby declare my intention to claim as a homestead the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ Sec. 28, T. 6 S., R. 31 E., less 32 feet in width off the east side of said section conveyed to William Horton and less 31 rods wide off the west side of said section conveyed to W. R. Thorington, and the actual cash value I estimate at three thousand dollars.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this, the 10th day of August, A. D. 1881. David Olds. [Seal.]"

[2] It will be observed that the declarant declares that he resides on the northwest quarter of section 28, which, according to the description immediately following in the homestead, consists of three distinct parcels of land, two of which the declarant does not own. He fails to specify, however, on which of those three parcels he was then residing. In other words, it cannot be determined from the declaration whether the declarant was then residing on the 32-foot strip on the east side of said quarter section, or on the 31-foot strip on the west side of said quarter section, or on the mid parcel which he afterwards attempts to select as a homestead. We are of the opinion that such omission is fatal.

Section 1263 of the Civil Code, as it read at the time of the filing of this declaration, required that a declaration of homestead must contain a statement "that the person making it is residing on the premises, and claims them as a homestead." If the statement of residence, or any of the other statements required to be made by said section, is omitted, the homestead is void. It was said in Jones v. Gunn, 149 Cal. 687, 87 Pac. 577:

"While it is true that homestead and exemption laws are remedial and generally, must be liberally construed in order to effect the purposes intended thereby, yet it is equally true that homesteads and homestead exemptions are the creatures of statute, and that the failure to comply with any statutory requirement essential to a valid declaration of homestead cannot be supplied by liberal construction. Indeed, the Supreme Court of this state has generally held that homestead claimants must quite strictly comply with the statutory requirements as (formerly) to wife's acknowledgment (Beck v. Soward, 76 Cal. 530, 18 Pac. 650) as to head of family (Reid v. Englehart-Davidson, etc., Co., 126 Cal. 527, 77 Am. St. Rep. 206, 58 Pac. 1063); as to residence on premises (Boreham v. Byrne, 83 Cal. 27, 23 Pac. 213); as to statement of husband's failure to make declaration (Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 113, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27, 54 Pac. 535); and as to estimate of the actual cash value of the premises, etc. (Tappendorff v. Moranda, 134 Cal. 421, 66 Pac. 491)."

And in Tappendorff v. Moranda, 134 Cal. 419, 66 Pac. 491.

"The right to a homestead, and to enjoy the privileges and immunities incident thereto, is purely of statutory creation, and exists only upon a compliance with the requirements of the statute. What the statute has specifically prescribed as a requisite for impressing the incidents of a homestead upon a tract of land is mandatory, and cannot be dispensed with."

In Boreham v. Byrne, 83 Cal. 23, 23 Pac. 212, it was held that where the declarant stated that he was "in possession" of certain described premises which he claimed as a homestead it was not the equivalent of the required statement of residence. It was there said:

"Nothing could make the premises a valid protected homestead without such a declaration as the statute required. Actual residence on the land would not so make it, in the absence of a sufficient declaration. A declaration sufficient in form without residence, and residence without a sufficient declaration are alike ineffectual to constitute a homestead."

The case of Harris v. Duarte, 141 Cal. 497, 70 Pac. 298, 75 Pac. 58, was one in which it was shown that a parcel of land on which the declarant resided was not the one described in the declaration, and the court held the error to be fatal, saying:

"A declaration of homestead must contain a description of the premises claimed, and a statement that the person making it is residing on the premises described."

Respondent endeavors to sustain the homestead by invoking the doctrine of liberal construction, as stated in Southwick v. Davis, 78 Cal. 504, 21 Pac. 121, and in Schuyler v. Broughton, 76 Cal. 524, 18 Pac. 436. But the facts of those cases are quite dissimilar to the facts of the case at bar. In both of those cases the question of the statement of value was involved. In the former case it was stated in the declaration that the value "does not exceed $5,000," and in the latter case the statement was, "We do place the value of said land at a sum not to exceed sixteen hundred dollars." In both cases it was held that the words used were sufficiently definite to convey an expression of an opinion of value.

[3] Respondent further contends for the application of the rule that ambiguity or obscurity in a written instrument may be removed by extrinsic evidence, from which he argues that, since the evidence shows that the dwelling was located on the mid parcel, the defect in the declaration is cured. The established rule is, however, that the right of a claimant to select a homestead and impress upon it an exemption from forced sale must appear upon the face of the declaration, and its omission cannot be supplied by extraneous evidence. Reid v. Englehart-Davidson Co., supra, 126 Cal. 527, 58 Pac. 1063, 77 Am. St. Rep. 206; Boreham v. Byrne, supra.

In the light of the authorities above cited, the homestead in question must be held to be void, upon the ground that said declaration contained no statement that the declarant resided on the premises which he claimed as a homestead. That being so, the deed from David Olds to Thorington became an operative conveyance, and the determination of the question of the defendants' prescriptive title becomes unnecessary.

Judgment reversed.

OAKLAND STREET IMPROVEMENT BOND CO. v. FITZMAURICE, City Treasurer. (Civ. 3440.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 29, 1920.)

Constitutional law — §121(2) — Street assessment is a contract and statutes in force at time thereof as to its enforcement are part thereof.

A "street assessment" is a contract, and the statutes in force at the time prescribing the manner of its enforcement are a part thereof, and the holder of a bond securing an assessment issued prior to the amendment of Improvement Act 1911, § 68, in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 554) could require the city treasurer to advertise for sale and sell the property subject to the lien without depositing the cost of having a search of the records made for the purpose of ascertaining the name of all lien holders of record.

Application by the Oakland Street Improvement Bond Company for a writ of mandate prayed to be directed to W. M. Fitzmaurice, as City Treasurer of the city of Oakland, to require sale of property under lien of assessment for street work. Writ granted.

E. S. Page, of Oakland, for petitioner.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., and Leon E. Gray, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The respondent demurs generally to the petition on which an alternative writ of mandate was issued. The facts are not subject to controversy. A single question of law is involved.

Under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), the assignors of the petitioner under public contract performed certain street work in the city of Oakland. In due course assessment was made on the property subject thereto, and upon one of the lots the amount of the assessment was secured to be paid by a lien for a statutory bond issued by the city treasurer on October 29, 1914. After default in payment of certain installments which became due under the bond, demand was made on the respondent by the holder of the bond for the advertisement for sale and the sale of the property subject to the lien. He refused to advertise unless the bondholder should first deposit with him the cost of having a search of the records made for the purpose of ascertaining the names of all lienholders of record, or unless the bondholder should have such a search made, justifying his refusal upon the provisions contained in section 68 of the Improvement Act, as that section was amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 554).

At the time of the issuance of the bond the section in question required the treasurer, after default and demand, to publish a notice of the proposed sale in a newspaper, and that a similar notice should be "served upon any such owner if known, either personally or by depositing the same in the post office at such city, addressed to such owner at his address, if known, with the postage prepaid thereon." By the amendment of 1919 the quoted clause was made to read that a notice similar to that published should "be deposited by the city treasurer in the post office at such city, addressed to the person to whom said property is assessed upon the last assessment roll of such city, * * * if known, and to all record lienholders, with the postage thereon prepaid. When the addresses of such persons are unknown the notice shall be mailed to them at the city in which said property is located." The act makes no provision for the original cost of ascertaining the names of the lienholders of record, nor for the collection thereof from the proceeds of the sale of the property or as a part of the amount secured by the bond in the event of tender of the amount due prior to the date of sale.

The case is not to be distinguished in principle from the recent decision of the Supreme Court on rehearing in bank affirming a decision of Department 2 of the Supreme Court, which affirmed the judgment of the superior court in Los Angeles county. Chapman v. Jocelyn, February 19, 1920, 187 Pac. 962. It was there held that the case must be determined upon the act as it existed when the bond was issued. A street assessment is a contract, and the provisions of the statute in force at the time prescribing the manner of its enforcement are a part of the contract. In effect, the bond creates a power of sale, whereby its holder may enforce the lien of the assessment against the property described in the bond. The city treasurer is thereby made a special agent of the parties concerned, with authority to execute the power according to its terms, as found in the statute under which the bond was issued. The Constitution forbids the passage of a law impairing the obligations of a contract. "Not only is the bond and the statute a contract, but it is a contract forced upon the parties by the compulsion of law." Chapman v. Jocelyn, supra.

It was well said upon oral argument that to put upon the bondholder the burden of having expert searchers of records determine the names of record lienholders, when no provision is made for the repayment of the expense of such search, would in many instances deprive such bonds of all value, because the cost would amount to more than the amount secured by the bonds.

Let the peremptory writ issue, directing the respondent to make advertisement in accordance with the provisions of the act as it stood at the date of the issuance of the bond.

STONER et al. v. SECURITY TRUST CO.
et al. (Civ. 3175.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⚡882(21) — Failure to request reporter's transcript cannot be complained of where respondents failed to give notice of termination of proceedings for new trial.

Where notice of intent to move for a new trial has been given, but the motion has not been brought on for hearing nor any action taken within three months after service of entry of judgment, the proceedings on the motion were terminated without further order in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 660, and where respondents have failed to give notice of the denial of the motion "or of other termination thereof" as required by section 953a, they cannot, in the absence of anything showing a waiver of such notification, object on appeal to a consideration of the evidence on the ground that appellants did not file their notice with the clerk below requesting the reporter's transcript of the record within 10 days as required by the last-mentioned section; the trial court having discretion to approve the transcript when presented.

2. Quieting title ⚡19—Suit to cancel assignments of mortgage and for recovery of money collected will lie as one to determine adverse claim.

A suit to cancel purported assignment of note and mortgage and for the recovery of money collected by the assignees thereunder may be regarded as a suit under Code Civ. Proc. § 1050, to determine an adverse claim for money or property upon an alleged obligation, and is not objectionable as being an attempt to quiet title to personal property.

3. Descent and distribution ⚡91(1) — Heirs held entitled to sue to cancel assignment of mortgage by decedent and for amounts collected.

Where a decree of final distribution had been duly entered, the distributees were vested with the absolute right and title to a note and mortgage claimed to belong to decedent, and could bring an action to cancel an assignment thereof and to recover money collected by the assignees thereunder.

4. Pledges ⚡16(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that assignment of mortgage was for security.

In a suit by heirs to cancel a purported assignment of a note and mortgage and to recover money collected by the assignees, evidence held to support a finding that the note and mortgage were assigned merely as security for money advanced.

5. Cancellation of instruments ⚡47—Evidence in suit to cancel assignment held to support finding that note and mortgage assigned were worth their face value.

In a suit by heirs to cancel an assignment of a note and mortgage and to recover amounts collected thereunder, a finding that the note and mortgage for $3,500 were worth their face value held supported by evidence that the land covered was worth $8,000 incumbered only by a first mortgage for $1,500, and by testimony that the makers of the note were considered financially good for the amount.

6. Bills and notes ⚡167—Note and mortgage with default and option clause held not negotiable.

A note and mortgage on land containing a default and option clause and executed as part of the same transaction held not negotiable.

7. Pledges ⚡40 — Pledgee cannot transfer greater interest in pledge than that he himself has.

A holder of a note and mortgage as security for a loan cannot by pledge or sale transfer to another a greater interest in the property than that he has himself.

8. Estoppel ⚡75—One clothing another with apparent ownership cannot assert title against transferee.

Where an owner of a nonnegotiable note and mortgage by assignment for security merely clothes his assignee with apparent title to the paper, and an innocent third party is thereby induced to deal with the apparent owner in reference thereto, the true owner is estopped from afterwards asserting his title.

9. Estoppel ⚡116—Purchaser relying on negligence of true owner has burden of proof.

If the purchaser from one who has not title to a note and mortgage pledged with him as security merely relies for his protection on the negligence of the true owner, he must show that such negligence was the proximate cause of the deceit.

10. Estoppel ⚡110—Facts constituting estoppel must be pleaded.

In an action to cancel an assignment of a note and mortgage, transferred for security merely, a purchaser from the assignee cannot maintain that the true owner was estopped because he clothed his pledgee with apparent ownership, unless he pleads the facts constituting such estoppel.

11. Trial ⚡393(1)—Findings need not be in any particular form.

Findings are not required to be in any particular form so long as they properly dispose of the material matters at issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Vining B. Stoner and others against the Security Trust Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Emmons & Johnstone, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Chas. H. Mattingly, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiffs, children and only heirs at law of Vandoren Stoner, claiming to be the owners of a certain note and mortgage executed to the decedent during his lifetime, brought this action to recover the same from the defendants, and for certain sums of money alleged to have been collected thereon. Defendants answered, alleging ownership of the note and mortgage in defendant Katze, by an absolute and bona fide assignment, and that the defendant Security Trust Company held the same as collateral security for certain loans made to defendants Katze and Coyne. The lower court gave judgment for plaintiffs, from which the defendants appeal, seeking a review of the proceedings upon their motion for a new trial.

During the life of Vandoren Stoner, L. P. Keester and M. P. Smith executed and delivered to him their promissory note for $3,500, payable in seven annual installments of $500 each, and secured by a second mortgage upon real property. The note provided that, should default be made in payment of any installment of interest or principal when due, the whole sum of principal and interest should immediately become due at the option of the holder. By an instrument in writing Stoner assigned and transferred the note and mortgage to defendant Katze; the assignment being absolute in form, and purporting to be "in consideration of the sum of ten dollars." This transfer, the trial court found, was made without any consideration, except the sum of $710 loaned by Katze to Stoner, and that the assignment was made as collateral security for the repayment of that amount, and for no other purpose. Stoner gave no authority or direction in reference to the hypothecation or other disposition of the note or mortgage.

Shortly after taking the assignment, Katze borrowed and received of the defendant Security Trust Company the sum of $750, giving his note for the amount. As collateral security for the payment of that note he transferred the Keester and Smith note and mortgage for $3,500 to the trust company; the assignment, by apt reference, being made to secure the particular note. At that time the bank had no knowledge, so the trial court found, that Katze held the assignment from Stoner merely as collateral security. Some time later Katze and Coyne, two of the defendants, borrowed from the bank an additional $500, giving their joint note therefor. Three days later, on May 20, 1913, Vandoren Stoner died. On July 28th following Katze, by an instrument in writing, executed a general assignment of the $3,500 note and mortgage to the bank. The reason for this transaction, as explained by the bank's clerk while on the stand, was that, having only a specific assignment to secure the $750 note executed by Katze, and having advanced an additional amount to Katze and Coyne on their joint note, the bank, on July 28, demanded the new assignment be "given for the money that had been previously advanced."

On the 8th day of December following Katze and Coyne executed a new note to the bank for $2,600. The previously executed notes for $750 and $500, respectively, were thereupon treated as "paid by renewal," and the difference between their total and $2,600, the amount of the renewal note, or $1,350, was credited upon the books of the trust company to the account of defendant Coyne. No new or further assignment was taken by the bank, but on that day it caused the general assignment of July 28th to be recorded, and continued to hold it "as security that they (Katze and Coyne) would pay that $2,600." The limited assignment of March 12th was not recorded.

There is some evidence that the bank had knowledge of the limited interest Katze had in the $3,500 note and mortgage before he hypothecated them for his $750 loan. Katze so stated in his letter to the attorney for the Stoner estate. However, the court found to the contrary. Aside from this bit of evidence, it does not clearly appear that the bank knew of the claim of the estate before the renewal transaction in December. The testimony on the question is conflicting, and the court made no finding in that regard. There is nothing in the record, however, to indicate that the bank made inquiry at any time, during the entire transaction, to inform itself on the point. It took the special and general assignments without any investigation as to the real interest of defendant Katze, in each case for money about to be or already advanced, and apparently by tacit consent, continued to hold the note and mortgage as collateral security for the repayment by Katze and Coyne of the $2,600, to which sum their indebtedness was enlarged by the renewal transaction.

Due administration of the estate of Vandoren Stoner was had, of which the bank had notice. As has been made to appear by diminution of the record, by the final decree of distribution, the note and mortgage for $3,500 executed by Smith and Keester were distributed to these plaintiffs.

The defendant Security Trust Company in its answer admits having collected and appropriated to its own use the first two installments of $500 each upon the $3,500 note and mortgage, together with the interest.

The lower court decided that plaintiffs are the owners of the note and mortgage and entitled to recover the installments of principal and interest collected by the Security Trust Company, less the sum of $710 and interest, representing the amount loaned by defendant Katze to Vandoren Stoner as consideration for the original assignment by Stoner to him. By the judgment this sum was directed to be deducted from the amount collected by the bank, and to be applied by it as a credit on the amount of its claim against defendant Katze. The assignment by defendant Katze to the Security Trust Company was set aside, and it was ordered to assign and deliver the note and mortgage to plaintiffs.

[1] Respondents make a preliminary objection to a consideration of the evidence in the case, upon the ground that the appellants did not file their notice with the clerk below, requesting a reporter's transcript of the record, within time. That notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order, or decree, or if a proceeding on motion for a new trial be pending, within ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a. The italics are ours. The defendants gave notice of their intention to move for a new trial. The motion was not brought on for hearing, nor was any action taken by the trial court in the matter, within three months after the service of the entry of the judgment, the effect of all of which was a denial of the motion without further order, and amounted to a termination of the proceedings on the motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 660. No notice of this "other termination thereof" was given, and there is nothing in the record which indicates that appellants either waived such notification or acted in the proceedings of the cause as if they had received formal and binding notice. They caused no undue delay, and the trial court acted well within its discretion in approving the transcript when it was presented.

[2, 3] Appellants contend that the complaint fails to state a cause of action in that it is based upon an attempt to quiet title to personal property, not provided for by sections 738 or 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and for the further reason that the heirs of the decedent may not maintain the action. The specific object of the suit was to cancel the two purported assignments of the note and mortgage, and for the recovery of the money collected by the assignees under them. It may be regarded as a suit under section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine "an adverse claim * * * for money or property upon an alleged obligation." Hoffman v. Kirby, 136 Cal. 26, 29, 68 Pac. 321. As to the other objection, a decree of final distribution in the estate of Vandoren Stoner was duly entered before the action was brought, the effect of which was to vest the absolute right and title to the note and mortgage in the distributees, who, as plaintiffs, brought this action. Garraud's Estate, 36 Cal. 277, 279-280.

[4, 5] The appellants urge as other grounds for reversal the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support certain findings, and that the findings themselves do not warrant the judgment. That the note and mortgage were assigned by Stoner to Katze, as security for money advanced, is amply supported by the testimony of a number of witnesses as to the admissions made to them by Katze that such was the fact, by his acknowledgment that such was the case contained in his letter to the attorney for the estate of Stoner, and by his own testimony concerning the transaction. His acts and relations with Stoner after the purported assignment, as related by himself, particularly under cross-examination by plaintiffs' counsel, and by the court, were inconsistent with his theory of an absolute assignment. His own denials only raised a conflict in the evidence, which the trial court has determined against him. The claim of the defendant Coyne was also shown by the evidence to be based upon money alleged to be owed to him by the decedent, Stoner. His attitude in the matter has much the appearance of being suggested by an effort to collect the amount out of the proceeds of the $3,500 note and mortgage, without the necessity of presenting a claim against Stoner's estate. The finding that the note and second mortgage for $3,500 were worth their face value is supported by the evidence that the land covered by the mortgage was worth $8,000, incumbered only by a first mortgage for $1,500, and by testimony that the makers of the note were considered financially good for the amount.

[6-9] The assignment by Stoner to Katze was for collateral security only. The note for $3,500, secured as it was by a mortgage on land, both being executed as parts of the same transaction, and containing the default and option clause, was not negotiable. Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 685, 65 Pac. 1110; National Hardware Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 5, 6, 130 Pac. 881. What, then, is the position of the defendant Security Trust Company under these circumstances? If the bank has any right which it can assert, other than the right to offset its claim against defendant Katze to the extent of $710, owed by the decedent Stoner to Katze, and which the court allowed and provided for in its judgment, it must be because it obtained the note and mortgage under such circumstances as would estop Stoner, and those claiming under or through him, from asserting their claim to its prejudice; for it is the general rule that one in possession of personal property can transfer to another, by pledge or sale, no greater interest in the property than he has himself. There is an exception to this rule, where the owner of the property clothes another with the apparent title to, or power of disposition over, it, and an innocent third party has thereby been induced to deal with the apparent owner in reference thereto; the true owner being in such case held estopped from afterward asserting his title. Chase v. Whitmore, 68 Cal. 545, 547, 9 Pac. 942; Shafer v. Lacy, 121 Cal. 574, 578, 54 Pac. 72; Shirey v. All Night and Day Bank, 166 Cal. 50, 55, 134 Pac. 1001; Fowles v. National Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 659, 140 Pac. 271. Under this principle, a bona fide purchaser of a nonnegotiable chose in action, from one to whom the owner assigned apparent absolute ownership, may obtain a valid title as against such owner, although the assignee may not be the true owner. This conclusion is reached by the application of the doctrine of estoppel, and the modification of the general rule relating to the transfer of personal property is placed upon that ground. Moore v. Metropolitan National Bank, 55 N. Y. 41, 14 Am. Rep. 173; 2 R. C. L. p. 632; Fairbanks v. Sargent, 104 N. Y. 108, 117, 9 N. E. 870, 6 L. R. A. 475, 58 Am. Rep. 490. But if the purchaser from one who has not the title, and has no real authority to sell, relies for his protection on the negligence of the true owner, he must show that such negligence was the proximate cause of the deceit. Barstow v. Savage Mining Co., 64 Cal. 388, 393, 1 Pac. 349, 49 Am. Rep. 705. The burden is upon the one seeking to invoke the exception to the general rule. Woodsum v. Cole, 69 Cal. 142, 145, 10 Pac. 331; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 45, 73 Pac. 803.

[10] In the instant case the defendant bank appears to have relied solely upon a legal defense to the action. It contented itself with making common cause with the other defendants in asserting that the assignment by the decedent Stoner to Katze was absolute and for adequate consideration. If it intended to interpose the equitable grounds of estoppel, it was incumbent upon it to specially plead the facts constituting such defense. Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 593; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 646, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982. Not having so pleaded, it could not be now considered (Burk v. City of Santa Cruz, 163 Cal. 807, 811, 127 Pac. 154), even though the appellant was now attempting to avail itself of it, which it is not. By neither averment or proof has it brought itself within the exception to the general rule. Such action on its part seems to be entirely consonant with its chosen line of defense. We feel that it was satisfied to abide by the fate of its codefendants. We are therefore constrained to hold that its interest in the hypothecated note and mortgage was measured by the extent of the advances made to Stoner by Katze, which the trial court has found, on evidence which we must admit is somewhat confusing, to be the sum of $710.

[11] In view of our conclusion in the matter, the point made that certain findings may appear to be immaterial need not be further considered. A large part of this objection arises, no doubt because the lower court's conclusions do not harmonize, with the theory of the appellants. Findings are not required to be in any particular form so long as they properly dispose of the material matters at issue. Millard v. Supreme Council, 81 Cal. 340, 342, 22 Pac. 864; Mott v. Ewing, 90 Cal. 231, 235, 27 Pac. 194.

We find nothing in the record which would have justified the trial court in granting a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

PALVUTZIAN v. TERKANIAN et al.
(Civ. 3257, S. F. 9093.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. April 9, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing June 7, 1920.)

1. Courts ⇨107—Decisions limited to matters before court.

It is elementary that every decision is limited in its application to the matters before the court.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1078(1)—Matters not argued deemed waived.

On appeal matters not argued by the appellant are deemed to have been waived.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨156(4)—Obvious easement impliedly retained by grantor of portion of land.

Where owner of land sold a part after the establishment of an irrigation ditch across the part conveyed, an implied understanding arose that the lands sold were to continue subject to the right to have the water flow through such ditch, the easement being obviously apparent and the parties having knowledge thereof at the time of the grant.

4. Estoppel ⇨107—Not necessary to plead estoppel in technical words if facts appear on face of complaint.

If the facts from which an estoppel arises appear on the face of the complaint, it is not necessary that estoppel be pleaded in technical words.

5. Estoppel ⇨78(3) — Contract regarding rights in irrigation ditch estopped landowner from denying existence of easement.

In an action for damages and to enjoin interference with irrigation ditches over defendant's land, defendant held estopped to deny the existence of an easement by reason of having entered into a contract with plaintiff and another adjoining landowner recognizing the existence of the easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by T. G. Palvutjian against John Terkanian and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

Astor Elmassian, G. L. Aynesworth, and H. M. Johnston, all of Fresno, for appellant. C. K. Bonestell and J. A. Steele, both of Fresno, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. From a judgment in favor of the defendants the plaintiff appeals. The suit was for damages and for injunction to prevent interference with certain irrigating ditches and the flow of water over the defendants' land for which the plaintiff claimed an easement.

The court found that prior to 1885 the predecessors of both the plaintiff and defendants owned in one body the lands now owned by them severally. While the lands were held in single ownership two irrigation ditches or canals were constructed across the tract. These ditches were connected with the main ditch or canal of the Fresno Canal & Land Corporation's system of irrigating ditches. Since their construction they have been the only source from which water can be obtained for the irrigation of plaintiff's land, except by the installation of a pumping plant or the acquisition of a right of way for ditches over other property. The ditches were at all times since 1885 the visible and obvious means of transporting water to the lands now owned by the plaintiff. For two or three years between 1885 and 1908 they were not used, but they were used continuously for five years commencing in 1909. In 1908 the owner of the entire tract conveyed to the defendant Terkanian one portion of the tract. Thereafter the grantor and his successors used the ditches on the portion theretofore conveyed. The plaintiff acquired his portion of the original tract in 1915. In October, 1916, "at the special instance and request of the defendant, John K. Terkanian and one Kienitz," who was the owner of an adjoining tract over which the ditches in controversy ran, Kienitz, the plaintiff, and Terkanian entered into an agreement which is summarized in the findings, but to which it is proper to make some further reference. Kienitz was named as the party of the first part, and the plaintiff, Palvutzian, and the defendant Terkanian were joined under the designation of the "second party." It recited the ownership of Kienitz of his land, "and that a certain ditch or canal is now located upon the premises of the first party, and that said ditch or canal is now used for the purpose of furnishing water for irrigation purposes to second party." It was agreed that "in consideration that first party furnish to second party through and by means of a pipe line [which was to be and was constructed in lieu of the old ditch on the Kienitz land] an amount of water equal to the quantity which has been furnished by said ditch or canal to second party, second party hereby agrees to waive any and all rights that they may or might have in said ditch, and further agree that said first party shall be allowed to obliterate said ditch and substitute therefor the said proposed pipe line, it being understood that first party shall in no manner lessen the quantity of water heretofore furnished to second party by and through said ditch or canal." Taking this contract by its four corners, it appears to have been made as much for the benefit of the plaintiff as for the defendant Terkanian, that the latter by joining in it recognized Palvutzian's right to the water as equal to his own, and that all three of the adjoining landowners recognized the right of the lower owners on the ditch to the flow of water over the lands of the upper owners, merely agreeing that on one of the upper tracts the pipe line might be substituted for the existing ditch, thus changing the easement from the right to have the ditch maintained to one to have the same flow of water through the pipes.

Pursuant to this contract the court further found that Kienitz constructed the pipe line and plowed up the ditches on his land; that Terkanian made a ditch connecting the Kienitz pipe line with the westerly of the two ditches over the defendants' land leading to that of the plaintiff, but refused in April, 1918, to allow the plaintiff to connect the pipe line with that ditch. In May, 1918, Terkanian plowed up and filled the easterly ditch and the westerly ditch so that the plaintiff could not thereafter obtain water for irrigation thereby. Sixty acres of the plaintiff's land was then planted in Thompson seedless grape vines, and 60 acres were in pasture. Neither the grape vines nor the pasture will grow or produce without irrigation during the irrigating seasons. It was then found that by reason of the acts of the defendants in plowing and filling up the ditches the plaintiff has been prevented from irrigating any portion of his premises from the old source of supply; that his grape vines and pasture have been dying out and will die out entirely unless they are irrigated; that there was water in the main canals of the irrigation system which would have flowed to and upon plaintiff's premises for irrigation if the ditches had not been plowed and filled up; that the plaintiff's land has depreciated in value in the sum of $300; that the defendants threaten and intend to and will keep the ditches plowed and filled up so that the plaintiff cannot obtain water through them for the purpose of irrigating his land; the plaintiff's damages unless water be obtained for irrigation will be irreparable, the premises materially reduced in value, and the pasture and seedless grape vines on the plaintiff's land will be rendered valueless; and that the plaintiff has no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law. The court further found that neither the plaintiff nor Terkanian had acquired as against the other any adverse interest in the ditches since the date of the deed to Terkanian.

Upon these findings the court concluded that by the conveyance to Terkanian the plaintiff's predecessor conveyed to him all his right, title, and interest in and to the ditches, and there was no express or implied right of way reserved over the land for ditches to irrigate the land he afterwards conveyed to the plaintiff, that in the use of the irrigation ditches after the deed to Terkanian plaintiff's grantor or successors in interest was without right, and that Terkanian had the right to plow and fill up the ditches and is not liable for damages which the plaintiff suffered thereby. The plaintiff and appellant maintains that upon the findings of fact these conclusions of law cannot be sustained, and that in the determination of this appeal on the findings judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for the damages found to have been sustained by him and for injunction in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

[1, 2] The respondent contends that under the facts the case is not to be differentiated from Taylor v. Avila, 175 Cal. 203, 165 Pac. 533 (Sac. No. 2276). The appellant relies upon a number of cases which unquestionably sustain his position, unless the decision in Taylor v. Avila, supra, is determinative. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69; Dixon v. Schermeier, 110 Cal. 582, 42 Pac. 1091; Jones v. Sanders, 138 Cal. 405-412, 71 Pac. 506; Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta R. Co., 164 Cal. 412, 129 Pac. 593; Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 Pac. 1025. Except Cave v. Crafts, cited upon another proposition than the one chiefly involved in this case, none of these cases was referred to in the opinion of Taylor v. Avila. An examination of the record and briefs in Taylor v. Avila shows that the rule of law announced in the cases relied on by the appellant was not presented to nor considered by the court. It had before it solely the question of the construction and effect of a particular deed. Upon this question the only matters argued in the briefs or decided by the court were that the language used in the deed purported to transfer to the grantee all water rights, ditch rights, etc., and that it did not purport to reserve any then existing water rights for the benefit of the tract of land from which that conveyed by the deed was severed. It is elementary that every decision is limited in its application to the matters then before the court. Grant v. Murphy, 116 Cal. 432, 48 Pac. 481, 58 Am. St. Rep. 188; Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690-697, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158. The decision under consideration was a department decision, and it does not appear that rehearing by the court in bank was sought. It is significant that in the opinion it was suggested there was a probability that the parties intended to include in the deed a reservation in favor of the grantor of the existing easement she then possessed and that by mutual mistake it was omitted therefrom. It was stated the complaint contained no allegation of such mistake, and the plaintiff did not seek reformation of the deed. The opinion closes with the statement that, "as the record stands, we have no choice but to reverse the judgment and order, and it is so ordered." It is also elementary that on appeal matters not argued by the appellant are deemed to have been waived. Churchill v. Lauer, 84 Cal. 233, 234, 24 Pac. 107; Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 35, 52, 53, 138 Pac. 728.

[3] If the appellant in Taylor v. Avila had presented to the court argument under the rule announced in Cheda v. Bodkin, supra, and Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta R. Co., supra, and the decision in Taylor v. Avila had been rendered in its present form, this court might have been warranted in concluding the effect of Taylor v. Avila was to overrule the earlier cases. That they are not overruled appears from the fact that in a later case the rule declared in Cheda v. Bodkin, supra, was re-announced by the Supreme Court, and that case cited as authority, the statement being:

"The mere fact that appellant's predecessor was the grantee of one of the respondents under a warranty deed does not prevent an assertion by plaintiff of a right to use the track. Where the owner of one tract of land sells part of it, and that part is burdened by an obvious easement in favor of other persons, or other parts of the larger tract, an implied understanding arises that the burdens and correlative advantages shall continue as they existed before the separation of the title." Southern Pac. Co. v. Los Angeles Mill Co., 177 Cal. 402, 170 Pac. 832.

This latter decision was one of the other department of the Supreme Court. It is not only the later opinion of the court, but it appears that there was an application for hearing which was denied. This court is bound by the later decision, supported as it is by a long line of decisions not considered in Taylor v. Avila.

The rule of law which was reannounced in Southern Pac. Co. v. Los Angeles Mill Co., supra, received lengthy and careful consideration by this court in Kallenberg v. Long, 179 Pac. 730, and in Nay v. Bernard, 180 Pac. 827, and in both cases it was applied in the manner in which the appellant maintains it should be applied in this case. The matter has received further careful consideration, and no reason appears why this court should overturn a rule of property which has been recognized in this state since the decision in Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135, decided by the Supreme Court in 1878. Upon the facts found by the trial court, it appears that when the Terkanian deed was made the land conveyed was burdened with an obvious easement for the maintenance of the ditches and flow of water to the property retained by Terkanian's grantor and subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff, and that under the rule to which reference has been made the defendants had no right to destroy the ditches and thus to irreparably injure the plaintiff and his lands.

[4, 5] This case may be further differentiated from Taylor v. Avila, in that it appears

In that case there was no allegation to support a reformation of the deed to express the true intent of the parties. In this case the plaintiff sets up the agreement by which Kienitz and Terkanian both recognized the right of the lower owners to the maintenance of the ditches and the flow of water, and the court found that the plaintiff entered into that agreement at the special instance and request, not alone of Kienitz, but of Terkanian. The contract on its face showed that it was made for the benefit both of the plaintiff and Terkanian. If the facts from which an estoppel arises appear on the face of the complaint, it is not necessary that estoppel shall be pleaded in technical words. Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 Pac. 695; Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 332, 70 Pac. 175. The effect of pleading this contract, connected with the finding in regard to it, creates an estoppel as against the defendants to assert that an easement, the existence of which was so recognized, does not exist.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to take such further proceedings as are consistent with the views herein expressed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank
Denying Hearing.

SHAW, J. Upon the denial of the petition for a rehearing in this case I deem it advisable to state one feature of the decision in Taylor v. Avila, 175 Cal. 203, 165 Pac. 533, which is not noticed in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and which clearly distinguishes it from the present case. The facts in that case were that originally Taylor owned 80 acres, being a west half of a north-west quarter, and Avila or his predecessors owned 40 acres adjoining the north end of the 80 acres. Through these tracts a ditch was made leading from the canal to the north, and it was in use for the purpose of irrigating both tracts. Afterwards Taylor conveyed the north 25 acres of her 80-acre tract to one Gularte. Thereafter she continued to use the ditch as before, although no reservation of the right to do so had been made in her deed to Gularte for her 25 acres. Afterwards Gularte sold the 25 acres to Avila and she joined with Gularte in the deed conveying said 25 acres to Avila.

The significant fact in the case is that she had no right or interest whatever in the 25 acres at the time she joined in the deed of Gularte to Avila, except her implied easement, consisting of her right to maintain the ditch through said 25 acres for the benefit of her remaining 55 acres of the 80-acre tract, and that her deed to Avila expressly purported to convey all ditch rights or interests in ditches for irrigating. The only effect the deed could have, so far as she was concerned, was to convey her right to the ditch. There was, therefore, no room for the operation of any implication that she reserved the ditch right, since, from the circumstances, it was obvious that the only possible intention on her part in joining in the deed was to convey to the defendant her right in the said ditch over the 25-acre tract. The case of Taylor v. Avila is in all respects parallel to that of Dixon v. Schermeier, 110 Cal. 582, 42 Pac. 1091, in which the same conclusion was reached, and it is not contrary to the decisions in Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 139, Quinlan v. Noble, 75 Cal. 250, 17 Pac. 69, Jones v. Sanders, 138 Cal. 405, 71 Pac. 506, Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 412, 129 Pac. 593, and Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 Pac. 1025.

In re STARR'S ESTATE.

STARR et al. v. GRIMES.

(L. A. 6371.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 3, 1920.)Exemptions — 50(1)—Insurance money of deceased leaving no spouse or minor children not exempt.

Proceeds of life policies, the annual premium of which does not exceed $500, although exempt to the insured during his life, under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 18, are to be treated as nonexempt property subject to decedent's debts, where there is no surviving spouse or minor children of the decedent; section 1465, relating to distribution of property, having no application in the absence of such persons.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph L. Starr, deceased, of which Helen L. Starr is administratrix. From a decree directing her to pay judgment, Mrs. M. E. Grimes, the administratrix, and her coheirs appeal. Affirmed.

W. A. Martin and Leland S. Bower, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Jesse F. Waterman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN, of the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, while acting as Justice pro tempore of this court in the place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of the court.

Joseph L. Starr died intestate in the county of Los Angeles, leaving an estate which consisted wholly of a life insurance policy of approximately $1,200, payable to his executors, administrators, and assigns, the annual premium upon which did not exceed $500. He left him surviving as his only heirs at law seven children all over the age of 21 years. Helen L. Starr, one of such children, was appointed administratrix of the estate. During administration the respondent obtained a judgment against the administratrix for some $1,600, to be paid in due course of administration. In due time the final account of the administratrix was settled and allowed, but the court denied her petition that the balance in her hands be distributed to the heirs of the deceased, and directed that she pay it to the respondent in liquidation and discharge pro tanto of her said judgment. The administratrix of the estate and her coheirs have appealed from the part of the decree directing such payment. In support of their appeal it is their claim that the whole of the estate is exempt from the payment of debts, and should be distributed to them after the payment of the costs of administration.

The provisions of our Code applicable to the situation described are found in section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subdivision 18 of which, in enumerating the kinds of property exempt from execution, specifies "all moneys * * * accruing or in any manner growing out of any life insurance" policy, etc., if the annual premiums paid do not exceed $500; and section 1465 of the same Code, which declares that all exempt property may be set aside for the use of the surviving spouse, or, in case of his or her death, to the minor children of the decedent. There is no doubt that under these sections the policy was exempt from execution during the lifetime of the deceased, and the proceeds after his death. The difficulty that arises in this case results from the fact that there is no express provision for the distribution of exempt property after the death of the debtor except in the case provided for in section 1465, Code of Civil Procedure. Here there was no one entitled to take the property under this provision. There was, therefore, no reason why this property should not be administered in the same manner as any other property belonging to the estate. The law requires that such property shall be applied first to the payment of the debts of the deceased, and after such payment shall be distributed to the heirs. The exemption was intended to apply to the decedent, and upon his death to the surviving spouse, and if there were no surviving spouse then to the minor children of the deceased.

The special provision contained in said section 1465 relating to the distribution of property which during the lifetime of the decedent had been exempt from execution, having as its only beneficiaries the surviving spouse and minor children of the decedent, has no application in the absence of persons comprised within these classes, with the necessary result that such property is to be treated as nonexempt property, and is therefore, like it, subject to the payment of the decedent's debts.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NIINO. (Cr. 2297.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1920.)

1. Criminal law ☞1159(2)—Judgment not reversed if supported by evidence.

The Supreme Court will not reverse a judgment given upon a verdict, unless there is no evidence to support it, or when the evidence relied upon to uphold it is so inconsistent or improbable as to be incredible, or when it so clearly and unquestionably preponderates against the verdict as to convince the court that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury.

2. Homicide ☞270—Sanity of defendant for jury.

3. Criminal law ☞452(2) — Witnesses acquainted with defendant competent to testify as to sanity.

In a prosecution for murder, where witnesses testified that they had known defendant for many years and were well acquainted with him and saw him frequently, held, that the court did not abuse its discretion in allowing such witnesses, as intimate acquaintances of the defendant, to give their opinion upon his mental sanity, under Code Civ. 4. Criminal law ☞1153(2)—Competency of intimate acquaintance to testify as to sanity matter within discretion of trial court.

The determination of the question as to whether or not one is an intimate acquaintance with another, and therefore competent, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 10, to give an opinion as to mental sanity, is to a great extent within the discretion of the trial court, whose ruling thereon will not be disturbed except where the evidence is such as to leave no just room for question that the discretion has been improperly exercised.

5. Criminal law ☞1035(3)—Remark of court not objected to not error.

A remark by the court, when a question arose as to whether or not one of defendant's witnesses should be permitted to give his testimony through an interpreter, "They can all speak English, but they won't," cannot be complained of on appeal, where the remark, when made, was not assigned as misconduct.

6. Criminal law ☞656(2)—Remark of court not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

T. Niino was convicted of first degree murder, and he appeals. From the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

F. E. Kilpatrick and H. Scott Jacobs, both of Hanford, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN, of the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, while acting as justice pro tempore of this court in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of this court:

The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree. He moved for a new trial, which motion was denied, and he was thereupon sentenced to suffer the death penalty. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

At the trial it was shown by the undisputed evidence that on October 27, 1919, the defendant shot and killed a young Japanese woman named Misco Hayashi, whom he desired to marry, but whose father had repeatedly refused consent thereto. Upon the last of such refusals the defendant almost immediately procured a double-barreled shotgun, went to the place where the young woman was at work in a vineyard picking grapes, and there deliberately fired two shots into her face and throat, causing almost instant death.

In support of his appeal the defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, that the court erred in admitting certain testimony, and that the court and prosecuting attorney were guilty of misconduct prejudicial to the rights of the defendant.

[1, 2] Defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. In view of the gravity of the case we have carefully examined the record in order to learn if this contention can be maintained, and after such examination we are satisfied that it cannot. This court will not reverse a judgment given upon a verdict unless there is no evidence to support it, or when the evidence relied upon to uphold it is so inconsistent or improbable as to be incredible, or when it so clearly and unquestionably preponderates against the verdict as to convince the court that it was the result of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. People v. Willard, 150 Cal. 553, 89 Pac. 124. The record before us discloses no such case. The evidence upon the only issue of fact in the case—the soundness or unsoundness of mind of the defendant—was conflicting. Witnesses were introduced by the defendant who testified that in a town in Japan of about 1,600 inhabitants, where the defendant was reared, his maternal grandfather and his mother were reputed to be insane; also that his brother and sister, as well as he himself, acted queerly, and were all regarded as mentally defective. There was also evidence tending to show that the defendant a few years before the trial had contracted syphilis; that he was subject to fits and was the victim of some nervous disturbance. A witness was also called who testified that the defendant was more excited and showed more concern over being served with summons and complaint in a justice's court suit than upon his arrest under the present charge. Two medical men, testifying as experts, after an examination of the defendant, and in answer to a hypothetical question, gave it as their opinion that the defendant was not sane on the day he shot the deceased. On the other hand, there were a number of witnesses introduced by the prosecution, intimate acquaintances of the defendant, whose opinion on this question was contrary to that of the doctors. Under such evidence, it was clearly a question of fact for the jury to determine whether, at the time of the homicide, the defendant was sane; and their conclusion that he was, as evidenced by their verdict, will not be disturbed by this court. People v. Willard, supra.

The defendant's claim as to the improper admission of testimony is directed to that of six of the nine witnesses called by the prosecution and who, as intimate acquaintances of the defendant, testified that on or about the day of the homicide he was of sound mind, and is founded upon the contention that none of these witnesses was such intimate acquaintance within the meaning of subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an intimate acquaintance may, upon a trial, give his opinion as to the mental sanity of a person.

One of these witnesses had known the defendant for seventeen years, and the latter had, during four or five years of that time, worked for him. He worked satisfactorily and their relations were friendly and up to a week of the shooting he visited and associated with the defendant.

Another witness testified that he, too, had known the defendant for about seventeen years; that within that time the defendant had worked for him during four or five plowing seasons, the last occasion being about two years before the trial; that he frequently saw the defendant after that, and in fact, had seen him the day before the shooting; that he and the defendant were on friendly terms and had often played cards together.

A third witness testified that he had known the defendant for sixteen or seventeen years; that during the first part of their acquaintance the defendant was engaged in business and during that time they seldom met, but later the defendant sold his business and went to the country, and thereafter the witness saw much of the defendant and they became well acquainted.

Still another witness testified that he had known the defendant about nine years, during which time they had worked together at different places, including that at which the homicide was committed. Another witness was a friend and associate of the defendant for four years.

The testimony of the other witnesses introduced as to this phase of the case was similar to the evidence just briefly detailed.

[3, 4] These witnesses were Japanese, and each of them testified that, in his opinion, the defendant was sane on the day of the homicide. No error was committed in allowing these persons, as intimate acquaintances of the defendant, to give their opinion upon his mental sanity. The determination of the question as to whether or not one is an intimate acquaintance of another, and therefore competent, under subdivision 10 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to give such opinion, is of necessity, to a great extent, within the discretion of the trial court, and the ruling of that court will not be disturbed except where the evidence is such as to leave no just room for question that the discretion has been improperly exercised. People v. Clark, 151 Cal. 207, 90 Pac. 549. It is plain that the court, in the instant case, did not abuse its discretion in admitting the testimony of the witnesses referred to.

[5, 6] During the trial a question arose as to whether or not one of defendant's witnesses should be permitted to give his testimony through an interpreter, upon which the court remarked, "They can all speak English, but they won't." It is claimed on behalf of the appellant that this observation by the court constituted misconduct which seriously affected his right to a fair trial. No such claim was made at the time of the occurrence, and the remark was not then assigned as misconduct. Moreover, we do not regard it as such, and we cannot perceive how it could have had an influence on the jury prejudicial to the defendant's substantial rights. Nor do we find any merit in the point that the prosecuting officer indulged in an unfair imputation against defendant's counsel which was prejudicial to the defendant. If the imputation charged was made, it was unfair, but it cannot be regarded as having had any effect on the right of the defendant to a fair and impartial trial.

It follows from the foregoing that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

et al. (S. F. 8829.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 10, 1920.)

1. Sales ◊52(7)—Finding that purchaser did not obtain possession by means of worthless check held warranted.

In an interpleader action involving disposition of proceeds of three carloads of hogs, finding that purchaser who at times between the date he gave a check and its presentation had on hands funds more than sufficient to cover the check was not guilty of fraud in obtaining delivery by means of a worthless check held warranted despite other contradictory evidence.

2. Sales ◊199—Whether title passes at delivery depends on intention as shown by circumstances.

Whether title to personal property passes through a sale thereof at the time of its delivery depends upon the intention of the parties as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case.

3. Sales ◊202(2, 3)—Title to hogs held not to pass where check for price was dishonored.

Where hogs were sold under an arrangement that check should be given at time of delivery, the sale should be treated as one for cash, and where the check was dishonored title did not pass; for, while delivery is a most significant fact as indicating the intention to transfer title, it is not conclusive, and where a check is accepted as a particular form of cash payment and is dishonored, the seller can resort to his original claim, on the ground that there has been a defeasance of the condition on which it was taken, and it is apparent where check was demanded at time of delivery that the sale was one for cash.

4. Sales ◊222—An attaching creditor has no greater rights in personal property than his debtor.

Where title to personal property did not pass to a buyer on delivery because the check for the purchase price was dishonored, the attaching creditor of the buyer has no right superior to his debtor, and the original seller is entitled to the property or proceeds as against the attaching creditor.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action in interpleader against J. Jacobsen and another, D. A. Taylor and Arthur Rosecrans, individually and as copartners under the firm name and style of Taylor & Rosecrans, and the Western Meat Company. From a judgment for last-named defendant, Taylor and Rosecrans appeal. Reversed.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Lillenthal, McKinstry & Raymond, Sullivan & Sullivan, and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice KERRIGAN of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District while acting as Justice pro tempore in this court in place of Mr. Justice MELVIN. It is adopted as the opinion of this court:

This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant Western Meat Company, and against the defendants Taylor & Rosecrans, in an action in interpleader.

Briefly the facts of the case are these: Taylor & Rosecrans, at the time the transaction here involved took place, were copartners engaged in the live stock business in the state of Idaho, as also was the defendant Jacobsen, their respective places of business, however, not being in the same locality. Shortly before the 10th day of June, 1915, Jacobsen, by telephone, purchased from Taylor & Rosecrans three carloads of hogs at an agreed price, the hogs to be delivered at a certain place in Idaho, where Jacobsen or his agent was to receive them and make payment therefor by check. Accordingly the hogs were delivered and a check for $3,490.98 was given in payment by Jacobsen's agent, the delivery of the check taking place at midnight on said June 10th. Before noon of the following day it was deposited for collection with the firm's bank at Burley, Idaho. It reached the bank in Idaho Falls on which it was drawn three days later, i. e., Monday, June 14th, when payment was refused for lack of funds. As is apparent, Saturday afternoon and Sunday falling within these three days, the actual business time comprehended within said period of three days was but a day and a half. There being no evidence in the record to the contrary, we will presume that the check was presented for payment in the ordinary course of business. On the 10th day of June, when the check was delivered, Jacobsen's bank balance was $1,733.37; on the next day, June 11th, Friday, said balance was increased to about $5,000; on Saturday, June 12th, it had been reduced to about $4,000, and on Monday, when the check was presented for payment, said balance was $1,341.57. Jacobsen had no arrangement with the bank for credit or overdraft.

Shortly after the purchase of the hogs by Jacobsen he disappeared. Commencing with June 14th many checks drawn by him were, when presented at the bank, dishonored. In the meantime Jacobsen had shipped the hogs to the plaintiff, which in turn disposed of them in San Francisco, and the fund involved in this litigation is part of the sum realized by the plaintiff from their sale. While there is some dispute on the subject, nevertheless it fairly appears from the record, not only that defendants Taylor & Rosecrans, upon learning of the dishonor of the check, demanded the fund from the plaintiff under a claim of ownership, but also that the respondent, Western Meat Company, a creditor of Jacobsen, at about the same time commenced an action against him and levied an attachment on this fund. The plaintiff being thus confronted with two conflicting claims, commenced this action in interpleader against the partnership, Jacobsen, and the Western Meat Company. Jacobsen defaulted, and judgment went for the Western Meat Company as against Taylor & Rosecrans, who have appealed.

[1] The appellants contend that Jacobsen, having obtained delivery of the hogs by means of a worthless check, was guilty of fraud, and that therefore the sale was void, both as to Jacobsen and his attaching creditor. It is true, as contended by the appellants, that the issuance by Jacobsen of this check, payment of which was refused for lack of funds, coupled with his unexplained disappearance, is some evidence of fraud. It appears, however, that after the issuance of the check, and before its presentation for payment three business days later, Jacobsen, on two of those days, had more than sufficient money on deposit to meet the check. This circumstance, with the presumption of innocence and fair dealing, furnish some foundation for the finding of the trial court against fraud, so that, in view of what may thus be regarded as a conflict of evidence, we are not at liberty to disturb this finding.

There are several technical points made by the appellants in support of their appeal; but, as we have concluded that the judgment must be reversed upon the main ground urged, it will be unnecessary to discuss these. We are thus brought to the consideration of the principal question involved, viz. whether or not title to the hogs passed at the time of the delivery by Jacobsen's agent of the check. We are of the opinion that this question must be answered in the negative, and, consequently, that the appellants are entitled to the fund as against Jacobsen's attaching creditor, the Western Meat Company.

[2-4] Whether or not title to personal property passes through a sale thereof at the time of its delivery depends upon the intention of the parties as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case, so that the question is ordinarily one of fact for the jury, or for the court when sitting without a jury. Where, however, the facts bearing upon the question of intent are undisputed, only a question of law is presented. Here the evidence shows without conflict that Jacobsen was to pay for the hogs upon delivery by check; and it is argued by the respondent that accordingly, a check having been given and received in payment for the hogs, title to the animals passed to the buyer notwithstanding that upon due presentation the check was dishonored. This argument is supported by reference to cases holding that parties may agree to accept a check or bill or note as absolute payment for goods sold, in which case title to the goods will pass upon such acceptance irrespective of whether the paper is honored upon due presentation or not. We think, however, that the facts of this case do not bring it within the principle referred to, for it is quite apparent that the requirement of the vendor that a check should be given by the buyer upon the delivery of the hogs was intended as the equivalent of an insistence upon payment on delivery; in other words, that it was not a sale on credit, nor for the check as such, but that delivery of the animals and payment for them, though such payment might be made by check, were to be simultaneous, and the transaction was understood by the vendee in this sense. The legal situation thus arising can logically be no different from one where the terms of the sale are cash on delivery and a check is accepted by the vendor. In such case it is held that the acceptance of the check is no waiver of immediate payment; and, although delivery is made of the goods upon receipt of the check, title thereto does not pass as between the parties unless, upon due presentation, the check is paid.

"A check is accepted as a particular form of cash payment, and if dishonored the vendor may resort to his original claim on the ground that there has been a defeasance of the condition on which it was taken." Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) pp. 755-772.

"If the sale is for cash, and the check of the buyer is taken, this will operate as no more than a conditional payment, as well as a conditional delivery; and if upon due presentation of the check it is dishonored the vendor may retake possession of the goods." 23 R. C. L. p. 1448.

"While a delivery is perhaps the most significant fact as indicating an intention to transfer the title, it is not conclusive, and, notwithstanding there has been a delivery, the property will not pass if it appears that such was the intention of the parties, as when payment is made a condition precedent to the passing of the property." 35 Cyc. 308.

"The title will not pass until payment if by the terms of the contract such payment is a condition precedent, or if it otherwise appears that such was the intention of the parties, unless the condition as to payment is waived." Id. 322.

"The condition as to payment or security is one which may be waived by the seller, in which case title to the goods sold will vest in the buyer although the condition has not been performed. * * * Whether the delivery is conditional or unconditional depends primarily upon the intention of the parties as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case, and so it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury."

If the sale is for cash, the mere acceptance of a check does not constitute absolute payment or waiver of the condition as to payment. Where the seller delivers the goods conditionally and without any intention of waiving payment or security, the property does not pass; and in order to render the delivery conditional within the application of this rule it is not necessary that there should be any express declaration to that effect, but it is sufficient if it appears that such was the understanding of the parties, or that the delivery was made in the expectation of immediate payment, the question being primarily one of intention, as shown by all the facts and circumstances of the case. * * * So if the seller delivers on an understanding, express or implied, that he is to receive immediate payment or security he may reclaim the goods, or if he delivers on payment by check instead of cash, and the check is dishonored, he may reclaim the property." Id. pp. 327, 328.

In effect, this sale was for cash as distinguished from a sale on credit, payment to be made, as is customary in similar commercial transactions, by check, and as it was not agreed that the check was to be received as absolute payment, and the delivery of the goods also was conditional, and the check, upon due presentation was dishonored, title to the hogs remained in the seller. In Johnson, etc., Co. v. Central Bank, 116 Mo. 558, 22 S. W. 813, 38 Am. St. Rep. 615, it is held that a check given for the purchase price does not constitute payment until the money is actually received by the vendor, unless it is otherwise expressly agreed. In Nat. Bank v. Chicago, etc., Ry., 44 Minn. 224, 46 N. W. 342, 560, 9 L. R. A. 263, 20 Am. St. Rep. 566, it is held that where goods are sold for cash on delivery, and payment is made by check, such check is, in fact, payment only when the cash is received on it, and that there is no presumption that a creditor takes a check in payment from the mere fact that he accepts it from his debtor. The presumption is just the contrary. Such payment is only conditional, or a means of obtaining the money. So, in Hodgson v. Barrett, 33 Ohio St. 63, 31 Am. Rep. 527, it is held that payment by check is a mere mode of making a cash payment; that it is conditional only; and if the check, upon due presentation, is dishonored, the vendor may retake the goods from the purchaser.

There is nothing in this record indicating that the original sellers intended to accept Jacobsen's check as absolute payment. True, they were to accept a check in payment for the hogs, but this is the usual method in cash transactions of any magnitude, and it is employed as a matter of convenience, and to obviate the necessity of handling and transporting large sums of money with its attendant risks. In the case of Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris v. Dres- bach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28, it is said that the language of the manager of the plaintiff bank in stating that a check which was subsequently dishonored was accepted in payment of the debt sued upon should not be construed as signifying anything more than the provisional or conditional payment presumed by law, and is no evidence of absolute payment.

The title to the hogs, therefore, as between the parties to the sale having remained in the original sellers, it follows, we have no doubt, that the fund in the hands of the plaintiff, the purchaser from Jacobsen, constituting part of the purchase price, belongs to the original sellers, Taylor & Rosecrans; and we also entertain no doubt that so far as the attaching creditor is concerned it has no better right to the fund than Jacobsen himself. Ward v. Waterman, 85 Cal. 491, 508, 24 Pac. 930.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE ex rel. MASTICK et ux. v. LAKE COUNTY WATER DIST.
et al. (S. F. 8850.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses ☞216—Act providing for water districts and for inclusion of lands without notice not unconstitutional.

If act providing for creation of water districts authorized inclusion in district by supervisors of lands not included within boundaries defined by any noticed petition, without consent of owners and without notice or opportunity to them to be heard, the act would not thereby violate any constitutional guarantee.

2. Waters and water courses ☞226—Act for organization of water districts precludes inclusion of land not within boundaries shown in petition.

St. 1913, p. 1049, providing for the incorporation of county water districts, precludes the inclusion by the supervisors of land not included within the district as shown by petition initiating the proceeding, published notice of proposed presentation of which is required, except when such inclusion is had on application of the owner of the land.

3. Waters and water courses ☞226—Act for incorporation of water districts permits supervisors to exclude lands within proposed district to extent stated.

St. 1913, p. 1049, providing for the incorporation of county water districts (section 3), held to mean that solely with regard to territory described in the petition the supervisors shall make such changes in the proposed boundary as may be deemed advisable, provided that they may not exclude from the district as proposed by the petition any territory to be benefited, in their judgment, or allow to remain therein any lands which will not be so benefited, except that on application or with consent of owner of land outside the proposed district they may in their discretion add such land.

4. Waters and water courses 226 — Water district to which lands other than shown in petition were added not properly organized.

Lake county water district, to whose territory, as shown by original petition, the board of supervisors added 50,000 acres separated from the district by high mountains, increasing its area by approximately one-third, this not on application of any owner of such added land, held not organized in compliance with St. 1913, p. 1049.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Proceeding in quo warranto by the People of the State of California, on the relation of George H. Mastick, and Lizzie Mastick, his wife, against the Lake County Water District and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Alan C. Van Fleet, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. E. Witherspoon, of Lakeport, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in quo warranto against the Lake county water district and its directors to have it adjudged that all proceedings had relative to the formation of such district are void, and that the district be dissolved and restrained from acting as a corporation and exercising the franchise of a corporation, and for such other relief as may be meet and proper. Judgment was given decreeing the district to be a legally created, acting, and existing county water district of the state of California, duly organized and incorporated under the act relative to such districts, approved June 10, 1913, and, in effect, denying the relators all relief. We have here an appeal by plaintiffs from such judgment.

Two principal claims are made by appellants; one being that there was such a material and substantial departure by the board of supervisors from the provisions of the act in the matter of inclusion in the proposed district of lands not within the boundaries of the district, as set forth in the original petition as to render the whole proceeding void; and the other being that if the act purported to authorize the course followed in this matter it is in violation of rights guaranteed relators by both federal and state Constitutions.

ing for the incorporation, organization, and powers of county water districts. It provides explicitly how such a district may be brought into existence. By its terms:

"The people of any county, * * * or portion of a county, * * * having a population of not less than one thousand inhabitants, may organize a county water district under the provisions of this act by proceeding as herein provided." Section 2.

The proceeding for the creation of such a district must be inaugurated by the presentation to the board of supervisors of the county at a regular meeting of a petition signed by "registered voters within the boundaries of the proposed water district, equal in number to at least ten per centum of the number of votes cast in said proposed county water district for the office of Governor" at the last general election. The petition must "set forth and describe the proposed boundaries of such water district, and shall pray that the same be incorporated" under the provisions of the act. The text of the petition must be published in a newspaper or newspapers printed and published in the county, together with a notice stating the time of the meeting of the board of supervisors at which the same will be presented and considered, for at least two weeks before the time at which the same is to be presented; the publication showing the names of at least five of the signers and the number of signatures attached. The published notice must also state that at the time stated "all persons interested therein may then appear and be heard." At such time the board of supervisors shall hear the petition and those appearing thereon and may adjourn such hearing from time to time, not exceeding four weeks in all. Then follow the provisions here directly involved, which are as follows:

"On the final hearing said board shall make such changes in the proposed boundaries as may be deemed advisable and shall define and establish such boundaries. But said board shall not modify said boundaries so as to exclude from such proposed district any territory which would be benefited by the formation of such district; nor shall any lands which will not, in the judgment of said board, be benefited by such district, by means of any of said systems of works, be included within such proposed district. Any person whose lands are benefited by such district may upon his application, in the discretion of said board, have such lands included within said proposed district."

Upon the final determination of the boundaries of the district the board must give notice of an election to be held in the proposed water district for the purpose of determining whether the same shall be incorporated. If a majority of the votes in each municipal corporation or part thereof included in the district, and also in the unincorporated territory included therein, be in favor of such incorporation, the board shall make an order declaring the territory duly organized as a county water district. On this a certificate of incorporation is issued by the secretary of state, and thenceforth the district is deemed incorporated. The board's finding in favor of the genuineness and sufficiency of the petition and notice is final and conclusive against all persons except the state upon suit commenced by the Attorney General within one year after the order of the board declaring the district organized. (This suit was so commenced.) The district is governed by its own board of directors selected in the mode provided in the act. It is clothed with all the powers appropriate to the acquirement and operation, as a business, of a water system which is primarily for the benefit of the inhabitants and property in the district, and water of which, when there is a surplus, may be sold outside the district. In aid of its purposes it may issue bonds, the principal and interest thereof to be paid by the district. The express intention of the act is to require all operating expenses, as well as expense of repairs and depreciation of works and interest on bonded debt and, "so far as possible," principal of bonded debt as it falls due, to be paid from the revenues of the district, the directors being commanded to fix such rates for water as will enable this to be done; but it is expressly provided that if, from any cause, the revenues are inadequate to pay such interest or principal, the directors shall furnish to the board of supervisors and county auditor an estimate of the minimum amount of money required, and the board must levy a tax on all property in the territory comprising the district to raise the amount. This tax constitutes a lien on all the property in such territory, having the same force and effect as other liens for taxes.

The original petition presented in this manner, referred to as the Maher petition, was for the organization and incorporation as a county water district of certain territory described therein, constituting the central part of Lake county, surrounding Clear Lake, the waters of which, its tributaries, and other sources of water within the contemplated district it was proposed to use. It was signed by the requisite proportion of voters of the proposed district, and notice of the proposed presentation of the petitions and the time thereof was duly published, as required by the act. The matter came on for hearing as noticed. While the matter was pending before the board of supervisors two other petitions, with an aggregate of 73 "registered voters in a part of Lake county that was not included in the proposed water district," were presented, one known as the Akin petition and the other as the Herrick petition. These petitions asked that there be included in the proposed water district all that part of the county south of the district as originally proposed, the additional territory comprising, it is said, 50,000 acres, and increasing the area of the proposed district approximately one-third. All of this additional territory is separated from the lands described in the Maher petition "by high mountains." Of this additional territory the relators own 4,412.81 acres. No notice was ever published of the proposal to present or the presentation of either the Akin or Herrick petitions. Neither of the relators signed any of the petitions, or received notice "of any kind or character whatsoever of the proceedings or any part thereof," or "had an opportunity to be heard before the board of supervisors of said county as to whether or not the" additional territory "should be included within" the district, or "to be heard at all on the matter of the formation of the" district. The board included the additional territory in the district, and at the special election held thereafter within the district as finally fixed by the board a majority of the votes cast were in favor of the incorporation of the district. It may be noted that the report of the vote by precincts contained in the record indicates that the vote in the additional territory was heavily against the proposition. The board then made its order declaring the district, as enlarged by the additional territory, duly organized and on January 15, 1916, the certificate of the secretary of state was issued. This action was commenced within three months thereafter.

[1] It may be conceded solely for the purposes of this decision that, assuming that the act authorized the inclusion in the proposed district by the board of supervisors of lands not included within the boundaries defined by any noticed petition, without the consent of the owners of such land, and without any notice to them or opportunity to them to be heard before the board upon the question of the propriety of including their land in the proposed district, there would be nothing therein opposed to any constitutional guaranty, and this upon the theory that the steps provided for the organization of such a district are simply for the creation of a public corporation to be invested with certain public duties which it is to exercise in behalf of the state and which do not directly affect private property. See Henshaw v. Foster, 176 Cal. 507, 513, 515, 169 Pac. 82. So conceding, it would, however, seem most reasonable, in view of the provisions of the act, that every property owner whose property is proposed to be included should have some sort of notice and opportunity to be heard on that question. What we have said as to the act shows that all the property in such a district is practically pledged to the proper operation of the district and the discharge of all its obligations, financial and otherwise. The hearing before the board of supervisors prior to the final fixing of the boundaries provided by the act is the only opportunity afforded a property owner to show that his property, as to which it is proposed to create this obligation, would be in no way benefited by such district. That he should have such an opportunity was doubtless one of the main objects for the notice of hearing provided by the act.

[2] Although the precise question appears never to have been decided by this court in any other way than as dictum, we are of the opinion that the act, reasonably construed, precludes the inclusion by the supervisors in such a district of land not included within the boundaries of the district as set forth in the petition initiating the proceeding, and of the proposed presentation of which published notice is required, except when such inclusion is had upon the application of the owner thereof. The petition is one by voters of the territory described therein, asking that such territory be incorporated as such a district. The proceeding is one directed exclusively to that particular territory, to determine whether it shall be constituted such a water district. No suggestion of the possible inclusion of land not part of this territory is provided for, either in petition or the notice. It apparently concerns, in so far as the enforced inclusion of their land is concerned, only those within the proposed district as the same is described in the petition and notice. It is in the light of this fact, together with the provisions as to notice, as well as in the light of what immediately follows, that we must read the provision that—

This is immediately followed by the provision that in any such change the boundaries shall not be modified so as to exclude from the proposed district any territory which would be benefited by the formation of the district. Then follows the provision that no land which will not, in the judgment of the board, be benefited by such district by means of any of said system of works, be included in such district. Then follows the independent separate provision that—

“Any person whose lands are benefited by such district may upon his application, in the discretion of said board, have such lands included within said proposed district.”

There is no express provision for the addition to the proposed district of land not included within the boundaries given by the petition other than the one just quoted, which makes the application of the owner a prerequisite to such action by the board. It is to be noted, too, that this provision is entirely superfluous if the board, by virtue of the previous provisions, already has the power to add such land to the district without the application or consent of the owner.

[3] We are of the opinion that, taken altogether, these provisions of section 3 of the act mean simply that solely with regard to the territory described in the petition the board of supervisors “shall make such changes in the proposed boundaries as may be deemed advisable,” provided that they may not exclude from the district as proposed by the petition any territory which, in their judgment, will be benefited by the formation of the district, or allow to remain therein any lands which, in their judgment, will not be so benefited, except that on the application or with the consent of the owner of land outside the proposed district, which will be benefited by the district, they may, in their discretion, add such land to the proposed district. The meaning might perhaps have been more clearly expressed, but this, we think, was the evident intent. Although in no way necessary to the discussion, this court in Central Irrigation District v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 360, 21 Pac. 825, 828, in considering a provision of the so-called Wright Irrigation District Law (Stats. 1887, p. 29), in all material respects the same as the one here involved, said:

“It is to be observed that no power is given to the board to include lands which are not included by the petition, except upon request of the owner.”

It was held in that case that there was nothing in the law requiring such request to be in writing. A similar provision contained in the irrigation district act of March 31, 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254), as amended March 26, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 510), was referred to in Imperial Water Co. v. Supervisors (certiorari), 162 Cal. 14, 25, 26, 120 Pac. 780, where it was claimed the order of the board of supervisors was void because it included certain tracts of land not within the boundaries described in the petition. The order was silent upon the question whether the owners of such land applied to have them made part of the district. It was said that the plaintiff was in no way interested in such land, and that “they comprise a very small proportion of the district as finally established.” It was said that “whatever the rights of the owners thereof [the land therein] may be, the consideration thereof is immaterial to the present case,” in that the plaintiff in that proceeding had “no right to invoke aid from them and no right to represent them here,” and that “the lands comprise so insignificant a portion of the district that the exclusion thereof from the legal boundaries would not be sufficient to nullify the order providing for the organization of the district.”

[4] This action is one contemplated by the act, an action seasonably commenced by the people of the state on the relation of owners whose land has been improperly included in the district. The territory added by the board, as we have seen, comprised some 50,000 acres, separated from the proposed district "by high mountains," and increasing the area of the district approximately one-third. It is not made to appear that a single owner of any of this 50,000 acres of land asked that his land be included in the district, the only request in the matter being that of certain "registered voters" of portions of Lake county not included in the proposed water district. Certainly it cannot fairly be said that the departure from the law in the matter of the organization of this district, as we read it, was not a very substantial one. It seems to us to be such that it may not fairly be held that the district was organized in accord with the provisions of the act, substantial compliance with which is essential.

The judgment is reversed.

CALIFORNIA NAT. SUPPLY CO. v. FLACK et al. (L. A. 6060.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 9, 1920.)

1. Corporations — 426(7) — Payment on note a ratification of its unauthorized execution.

A payment on a note by a corporation was a ratification of the note's unauthorized execution by a corporate officer.

2. Corporations — 592 — Proclamation unnecessary to dissolution for nonpayment of license and franchise tax.

A corporation which fails to pay license and franchise tax becomes defunct, under St. 1915, pp. 425, 426, §§ 7, 10, 12, and St. 1913, p. 7, § 24, because of the nonpayment, and not by proclamation of the Governor.

3. Corporations — 630(6) — Judgment against defunct corporation void.

A judgment rendered against a defunct corporation, in an action brought after the forfeiture of its charter by reason of failure to pay license and franchise taxes, is void.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County, Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the California National Supply Company against C. L. Flack and J. H. Lindsey, as trustees for the Gate City Oil Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dockweiler & Mott and Albert M. Cross, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Flint & Jutten and H. S. MacKay, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This is an action brought upon a promissory note executed on behalf of the corporation by the president and secretary of the Gate City Oil Company to recover from the directors of that corporation, acting as trustees, after the forfeiture of the corporate charter for nonpayment of the license and franchise tax. The plaintiff recovered judgment and two of the defendants appeal.

The note sued on was given in renewal of notes executed for the purchase price of supplies furnished by the plaintiff to the defunct corporation. Only two points are presented on the appeal: First, that the court erred in refusing to permit evidence of the lack of authority of the president and secretary to execute the note in question; second, that an action had been previously brought upon the same note against the Gate City Oil Company, and that the judgment therein obtained against that company for the amount thereof was a bar to this action.

[1-3] As to the first point, it is sufficient to say that it is admitted that several months after the execution of the note the corporation paid $250 on account thereof. Such payment constituted a ratification thereof, and therefore the question of the previous authority on the part of the president and secretary to execute the same becomes immaterial. 10 Cyc. 1081. The second point depends upon the legal effect of the failure to pay the corporate taxes. The statutes of 1915 provide that the failure to pay the corporate license tax ipso facto terminates the corporate existence and that the forfeiture occurs on the Saturday preceding the first Monday in March (i. e., March 4, 1916) at 6 o'clock p. m. Stats. 1915, §§ 7, 10, 12, pp. 422, 425. See Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 81, 161 Pac. 1161; Kaiser Land & Fruit Co. v. Curry, 155 Cal. 638, 648, 103 Pac. 341; Lewis v. Curry, 156 Cal. 93, 96, 103 Pac. 493; Newhall v. Western Zinc Mining Co., 164 Cal. 380, 128 Pac. 1040. The provision requiring the Governor to issue a proclamation of such default and forfeiture is not contained in the license tax law, but in the law taxing corporate franchises (Stats. 1913, p. 7, § 24) and only applies to forfeitures for the nonpayment of the taxes on franchises. In either event the dissolution of the corporation is effected by operation of law, because of such nonpayment, and not by proclamation.

The case of Kehrlein-Swinerton Const. Co. v. Rapken, 30 Cal. App. 11, 156 Pac. 972, relied upon by appellant to establish the necessity of the Governor's proclamation to establish or create the forfeiture of the charter, has no application to the facts here, for that decision construed the act of 1905, which provided that the forfeiture occurred 60 days after the proclamation (Stats. 1905, p. 493, § 6), and hence properly held that proof of the proclamation was an essential element in establishing such forfeiture. Therefore, the prior action upon the note, begun March 10, 1916, was not saved by the proviso of the statute permitting the prosecution to judgment of actions pending at the time of forfeiture (Stats. 1915, p. 427, § 13), notwithstanding the fact that the Governor's proclamation was not made until March 28, 1916.

A judgment rendered against a defunct corporation in an action brought after the forfeiture of its charter is void. Crossman v. Vivienda Water Co., 150 Cal. 575, 585, 89 Pac. 335; Lowe v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 708, 712, 134 Pac. 190; Newhall v. Western Zinc Min. Co., supra. The prior judgment, therefore, was not a bar to the present action.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Master and servant ⇨305—Assault, though made in violation of orders, actionable.

A saloonkeeper is liable for an assault on a patron by a bartender, authorized to maintain order, though the assault was made in violation of express orders not to use physical force.

2. Master and servant ⇨302(3) — Assault, though malicious and willful, actionable.

A saloonkeeper is liable for an assault on a customer by his bartender, committed in the course of keeping the saloon in order, even though the assault was malicious and willful.

The words "including wrongful acts," in Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Edward Johnson against Oscar Monson and Charles Longren. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Monson appeals. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels, Joseph L. Taaffe, and Chas. J. McDonnell, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

E. B. Mering and M. J. Gillespie, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Monson from a judgment against him and the other defendant Longren jointly for $1,500, as damages suffered by the plaintiff because of a personal assault upon him by the defendant Longren. The facts, as they appear from the findings, are that Monson was the owner of a saloon in San Francisco, and employed Longren as bartender. The latter's duties were to manage the saloon, dispense liquors, and maintain order. The evening of March 17, 1917, the plaintiff was in the saloon, somewhat intoxicated, noisy, and engaging in verbal controversies with other patrons, but not quarrelsome or threatening physical violence. The bartender, Longren, told him to stop his noise, and, upon his failing to do so, assaulted him, inflicting personal injuries, to the plaintiff's actual damage in the amount of $1,500. No punitive damages were allowed. The trial court also found that the defendant Monson, the owner of the saloon, did not know of the assault until some days later, and did not authorize it, but did ratify it by retaining the bartender in his employ.

[1] The findings are not attacked, with the exception of the finding as to ratification. This is attacked, and practically the entire discussion on appeal is concerned with the matter of Monson's ratification of the act of his bartender. But the discussion is beside the mark. It is immaterial whether there was any ratification by Monson or not. The other facts found, whose support by the evidence is not questioned, are sufficient to sustain the judgment. This is true, although it is found that Monson did not authorize the assault or know anything about it at the time. It would, in fact, make no difference if the assault had been in violation of express orders to the bartender not to use physical violence on customers. The question is not one of authority as between the principal and the agent. As between them, it may well be that the agent's tort against a third person is without authority or is directly contrary to express orders. But the principal is nevertheless liable for the tort of the agent, provided it be committed by him within the scope of his employment. That the assault in this case was committed within the scope of the bartender's employment is plain. To be sure there is nothing to show that he was authorized or employed to commit assaults, but it is found that he was authorized to maintain order in the saloon, and the assault was committed in the course of his keeping order.

The illustrations of this principle are exceedingly numerous and familiar. For example, if some firm employing delivery trucks should expressly instruct its truck drivers not to exceed the legal speed limits under any circumstances, but one of them, in the course of his employment, did exceed the speed limit, and as a result of so doing injured some third person, the employer is responsible. The principle is stated thus in Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 39, 124 Pac. 704, 707 (41 L. R. A. [N. S.] 529).

"It is the general doctrine of the law, as it is our statutory rule, that a principal is liable to third parties not only for the negligence of its agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, but likewise for the frauds, torts or other wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as part of the transaction of such business. Story on Agency, § 452; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 65; Civ. Code, § 2338."

[2] The situation is not changed by the fact that the court finds the assault to have been malicious and willful. Under some circumstances the malicious or willful character of the agent's act is material in determining whether or not the act was committed in the course of his employment. If, for example, in the present case, the question had been presented as to whether the assault on the plaintiff had been committed in the course of keeping order in the saloon, or as part of an altercation purely personal to the bartender and the plaintiff, for which the principal would be in no wise responsible, the willful and malicious character of the assault would have some weight as showing that it was purely personal to the participants. But if it appear that the tort was in fact committed by the agent in the course of his employment, the employer is not relieved of his necessary responsibility by its malicious or willful character. In the present case it appears plainly that the assault was committed by the bartender as a means to compel the plaintiff to cease the noise he was making in the saloon; that is, as a means of performing the bartender's duty of keeping order.

[3] The only difficulty in the case arises from the somewhat ambiguous wording of section 2338 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"Unless required by or under the authority of law to employ that particular agent, a principal is responsible to third persons for the negligence of his agent in the transaction of the business of the agency, including wrongful acts committed by such agent in and as a part of the transaction of such business, and for his willful omission to fulfill the obligations of the principal."

This is followed by section 2339, which reads:

"A principal is responsible for no other wrongs committed by his agent than those mentioned in the last section, unless he has authorized or ratified them, even though they are committed while the agent is engaged in his service."

A casual reading of section 2338 might give the impression that the words "including wrongful acts" refer back to the word "negligence," so that the only wrongful acts of an agent for which the principal is declared to be responsible are wrongful acts of negligence. The present assault was, of course, not such an act. But this construction would take away all meaning from the words "wrongful acts," since all wrongful acts of negligence are fully covered by the previous expression "negligence." Furthermore, such a construction would mean that by the Code section it was intended, for no apparent reason, to change a universal and elementary rule of the law of principal and agent, and one essentially just. Every presumption must be against such a construction. It does no violence to the language of the section to hold that the word "including" is used in a conjunctive sense, as the equivalent of such expressions as "and also" or "as well as." So construed, effect is given to all the language of the section, and it is made to conform to what should be the law, and is, so far as we are aware, universally the law elsewhere. As so construed, the present case comes directly within it.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MAJORS. (Cr. 705.)

1. Burglary $\S$ 42(3)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In prosecution for burglary, evidence that defendant had possession of the stolen property, and that he had sold the property under a false name and for a grossly inadequate price held sufficient, in absence of an explanation, to sustain conviction.

2. Witnesses $\S$ 255(3)—Use of memorandum by witness to refresh memory as to dates and other details not error.

In prosecution for burglary, where a jeweler testified principally from memory as to buying the stolen property from defendant, his use of a memorandum made by him at the time of the transaction to refresh his memory concerning dates and other details held not error.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 418(1)—Testimony as to conversation in defendant's presence held admissible.

In a prosecution for burglary, testimony by jeweler who had purchased stolen property from defendant, as to a conversation with third person who accompanied defendant at the time, in the presence of defendant, held admissible.

4. Criminal law — 1170½(5) — Exclusion of cross-examination held harmless, in view of sufficiency of evidence.

In prosecution for burglary, where the unexplained evidence as to defendant's possession and sale of stolen property was sufficient to sustain conviction, court's refusal to permit defendant to examine jeweler, who had testified to buying property from defendant, concerning a visit made by defendant to jeweler's place of business after defendant had been charged with the crime, if error, held harmless.

5. Criminal law — 1169(1) — Admission of testimony held harmless, in view of sufficiency of evidence.

In prosecution for burglary, where unexplained testimony as to defendant's possession and sale of stolen property was sufficient to sustain conviction, the admission of testimony as to investigations made concerning place where defendant lived, if error, held harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

A. R. Majors was convicted of burglary. From judgment of conviction and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Paul W. Schenck and Frank Dominguez, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. [1] The defendant, having been convicted of the crime of burglary, appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, in this, that there is no evidence that the defendant committed the crime. That burglary was committed at the time and place alleged in the house of one George B. Varnum, is not now disputed. One of the articles stolen on that occasion was a pair of binocular glasses. The burglary occurred on the 11th day of February, 1919. One Levy, a jeweler testified that on the 27th day of February, 1919, he bought those glasses from the defendant, who then and there signed the name B. F. Strong on a memorandum of the sale, in the book kept by Levy. The witness Murphy, one of the officers who arrested defendant, testified that when arrested the defendant said that his name was James Wilson. A handwriting expert, whose testimony remains uncontradicted testified that the signature B. F. Strong, on Levy's book, was written by the same person who signed another document, whereon it was shown that the defendant had signed the name James Wilson. The sale made by defendant to Levy, of the binocular glasses and other jewelry, brought defendant only $10 for the lot. The glasses alone were worth $60. Conceding that mere possession by defendant of the stolen property after the time of the burglary would not be sufficient to warrant his conviction, it seems clear that such possession, taken together with his sale of the property, under a false name and for a grossly inadequate price, in the absence of any explanation—and none appears—are circumstances quite sufficient to sustain the verdict. People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 232.

[2, 3] It is contended that the trial court erred in permitting the witness Levy to testify from a private record kept by that witness, without first compelling the prosecution to lay the proper foundation; and in permitting the prosecution to prove by the same witness certain conversations had with and purchases made from one Soulard on February 26th, in the presence of the defendant. The memorandum from which Levy testified was shown to have been made by him at about the same time when the transactions occurred. He testified principally from memory, but used the memorandum to refresh his memory concerning dates and perhaps as to some other details. We think that the court did not err either in this matter or in allowing the testimony as to conversations and transactions between Levy and Soulard in the presence of the defendant. The sales made by the defendant to Levy on the 27th day of February occurred in the presence of Soulard. On the preceding day these two men had made the first of their two joint visits to Levy, and on this first occasion certain articles of jewelry were sold to Levy by Soulard in the presence of the defendant. Some of the articles sold by Soulard were a part of the loot which had been taken from the Varnum house on February 11th.

[4, 5] The remaining matters complained of by appellant are that the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to examine the witness Levy concerning a visit made by the defendant to Levy's place of business after the defendant had been charged with this crime; and in permitting the witness Wood to testify concerning the result of certain investigations made by him as to where the defendant lived. In view of the conclusion at which we have arrived concerning the matters previously discussed, it is unnecessary to enter further into the record concerning these two last assignments of error. They are not of sufficient weight and importance to affect the result of the case, or to enable us to say that there has been any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MUTCH v. LONG BEACH IMP. CO. et al.
(Civ. 2677.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1920.)4. Replevin ⚡82—Damages allowed to person deprived of use of automobile held excessive.

While the amount to be allowed one deprived of the use of an automobile is to be determined according to the market value of the use of the property, it is the net usable value, less the expense of keeping up the property, which may be recovered, and in determining the value of the use care should be taken not to permit the fixing of an amount out of all proportion to the value of the thing itself, and hence a judgment for $1,500 in a claim and delivery case, involving an automobile worth $400, was clearly excessive, and cannot be sustained, in view of Civ. Code, § 3359.

2. Attachment ⚡296—Sheriff not liable for detention of automobile until after notice of third party claim.

Where no third party claim was made to the sheriff as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 689, for more than 8 months after the levy of an attachment upon an automobile, the sheriff was at least not liable for the detention of the property for the period prior to the notice of claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Mutch against the Long Beach Improvement Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bowen & Bailie, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Denio & Hart, of Long Beach, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. In an action in which the defendant, Long Beach Improvement Company, was plaintiff and John B. Mutch, the husband of plaintiff in this action, was defendant, the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles levied an attachment upon an automobile as the property of said John B. Mutch. The property was taken on attachment on February 19, 1916. Subsequently the plaintiff here claimed to be the owner of the automobile, and made demand upon the defendant, Long Beach Improvement Company, for its possession. She made no third party affidavit of ownership nor demand upon the sheriff, under section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, until October 16, 1916, more than eight months after the levy. On November 26, 1916, this action of claim and delivery was brought to recover possession of the automobile and damages for its detention. During the pendency of the suit the automobile was delivered to the plaintiff, and thereafter judgment was given, determining the question of ownership in plaintiff's favor and awarding her damages for the taking and detention in the sum of $1,500.65 against both defendants. The defendants appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The main contention of appellants is that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment in the admeasurement and award of damages.

The items of damages going to make up the amount of the judgment consist of the sums of $1,297.50, for the rental value of the car from February 19, 1916, the date of the attachment, until October 17, 1917, the date of its redelivery to plaintiff—a period of 86½ weeks, at $15 per week—and $203.15 for loss of tools and appliances belonging to the car, cost of cleaning the car after its recovery, and depreciation of its value during its detention. The undisputed testimony fixes the value of the car at the time it was taken on attachment at $400. Plaintiff gets her car back, with $203.15 for its depreciation during its detention, and with over three times its market value for damages from being deprived of its use for about 20 months.

[1] Appellants interpose various objections to the measure of damages adopted by the trial court. Without discussing them in detail, we think it is sufficient to say that one thus deprived of the use of an automobile cannot recover the gross rental value of a fully equipped and maintained car, free from all expense of maintenance, repairs, and natural wear and tear, such as a rented car would naturally be subject to. It must be apparent at once that there is something wrong with a scale of damages that allows three times as much for the detention of an article from the possession of the owner for a period of two years as could have been recovered if the trespasser had completely smashed it up and destroyed it in the first instance. In this case the automobile was in use by the plaintiff as a pleasure car, and after its taking was not in use during its detention. But neither the fact that the plaintiff was not using the car for business nor the defendants' using it at all, would absolve the defendants from compensating the plaintiff for any detriment she actually sustained by its wrongful taking and detention; but it would be against conscience to permit a recovery so out of proportion to the value of the thing involved as appears here. Section 3359 of the Civil Code provides that "damages must, in all cases, be reasonable, and where an obligation of any kind appears to create a right to unconscionable and grossly oppressive damages, contrary to substantial justice, no more than reasonable damages can be recovered." While the amount to be allowed is to be determined according to the market value of the use of the property, it is the net usable value, less the expense of keeping up the property which may be recovered. In determining the value of the use under the above rule, care should be taken not to permit the fixing of an amount out of all proportion to the value of the thing itself; otherwise the result is not for compensation for use, but punishment for a wrong in a case where exemplary damages as such would not be allowed. So, where damages allowed for the detention of property for less than a year were more than twice the value of the property, it was held that such damages were grossly excessive. 23 R. C. L. 913; Armstrong v. Philadelphia, 249 Pa. 39, 94 Atl. 455, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 1082; Ann. Cas. 1914A, 381; Romberg v. Hughes, 18 Neb. 579, 26 N. W. 351.

[2] Judgment has been called to the fact that no third party claim was made to the sheriff, as provided by section 689 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for more than 8 months after the levy of the attachment. This fact would in any event absolve the sheriff from liability for the detention of plaintiff's property for the period prior to the notice of claim. It is expressly declared by section 689 that the sheriff is not liable for damages for the taking or keeping of such property to any such third person unless such claim is made. Code Civ. Proc. § 689; Killey v. Scannell, 12 Cal. 73; Fuller Desk Co. v. McDade, 113 Cal. 360, 363, 45 Pac. 694.

(Civ. 3234; L. A. 5829.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 19, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Rehearing June 18, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client § 109—Attorney of executrix not liable for permitting statute to run against note of estate taken by her in informal division.

Where executrix and others interested in estate without order of court divided the property by deeds and assignments, and executrix got a note as part of her share, and the property was taken from the hands and control of the attorneys for the executrix, the executrix could not recover amount of note from the attorneys by reason of collection of the note becoming barred by limitations six months after the division.

2. Appeal and error § 101(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Findings of the trial court based on squarely conflicting evidence cannot be interfered with on appeal.

3. Limitation of actions § 100(8)—Cause of action on fraudulent statement barred.

False representation by attorney of executrix on borrowing money from her that the note given therefor was secured by mortgage, and that the mortgage was "in the bank," did not postpone the running of the three-year statute of limitations, the executrix having the same means of discovering the falsity of the statement at the time it was made as she ultimately employed to that end; there being no proof of any affirmative action on the part of the attorney to prevent her employing such means at any time.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Iva N. Ricker Wilmot, as executrix of the estate of Samuel M. Ricker, deceased, against Elmer I. Moody and C. M. Simpson, individually and as partners. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed. Judgment affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

J. H. Merriam, and Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, all of Pasadena, for appellant.

Ticknor & Carter, Hahn & Hahn and Simpson & Simpson, all of Pasadena, and Elmer I. Moody, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff, as the executrix of the estate of Samuel M. Ricker, deceased, brought this action against the defendants as the members of a copartnership engaged in the practice of law, and who had been employed by her as such to advise and assist her in the probate of the will of the deceased and the administration of his estate, to recover the sum of $2,000.

The complaint contained two counts, the first of which was based upon allegations of negligence, in that the defendants allowed the statute of limitations to run against a promissory note for $1,000, executed by one Sylvester M. Rice, and being part of the assets of the estate, so that the amount of the note was lost. The burden of the second count was that the defendants had persuaded and induced the plaintiff, as such executrix, to loan to Elmer I. Moody, one of their number, the sum of $1,000 upon his promissory note, representing that the note would be secured by a mortgage on real property of greater value than the amount of the loan; that after the making of said loan and the acceptance by the plaintiff of said note of $1,000 executed by Moody, the defendants represented to her that a mortgage securing the same had in fact been executed and was "in the bank," together with a certificate of title relating thereto, whereas in truth no such mortgage had been or ever was executed, and that as the result of this transaction the estate was damaged in the amount of said loan. Following these averments of the second count and based thereon is an allegation that by reason of the fraudulent representations, facts, and circumstances therein set forth, the defendants fraudulently disposed of the money, goods, chattels, and effects of the estate. Judgment was prayed against the defendants for the sum of $2,000.

The answer of the defendants denied the material allegations of the complaint, and also pleaded certain special defenses to be hereafter referred to, and in support thereof introduced evidence at the trial that as to the cause of action contained in said first count the plaintiff and her brother and sister, being legatees of the entire estate and entitled to have distributed to them the whole thereof, had by agreement among themselves, and more than one year after the death of the decedent, their legacies being then due and payable, divided among them the personal property of the estate, and had executed and delivered to one another quitclaim deeds to the real property thereof without waiting for formal distribution by order of the probate court, and that the plaintiff under such division had received the Rice note as part of her share of said estate. That at said time the defendants, who had theretofore had possession of the securities belonging to the estate, delivered all of them to the plaintiff and her colegatees, and which delivery occurred about six months before the Rice note became barred by the statute of limitations. That the defendants, through Elmer I. Moody (who, of the members of the partnership, attended exclusively to the affairs of the estate), shortly before the date when said note became outlawed, advised and warned the plaintiff to take steps before said date should arrive to have the same collected or renewed, but which advice and warning were not heeded.

As a further defense to this cause of action it was alleged that the plaintiff, suing as executrix of the estate, was not the real party in interest, and that the cause of action, if any, was barred by sections 337 to 340, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure limiting the time for the commencement of actions.

As to the second count, the answer of the defendants denied that they persuaded or induced the plaintiff to make said loan to Moody, or that they made any representations that the loan, if made, would be secured by mortgage, or after it was made, that a mortgage securing it had been executed and deposited in a bank, and alleged that the loan was made to Moody individually upon the understanding that it was not to be secured by a mortgage or otherwise.

As to this note also the defendants introduced evidence at the trial that it formed part of the assets of the estate divided among the legatees in the same manner already detailed, and was the property of the legatee to whom in such division it had been assigned.

As to this count of the complaint also the answer of the defendants set forth that the plaintiff, as executrix of said estate, was not the real party in interest, and that the cause of action, if any, was barred by the same sections of the Code of Civil Procedure as pleaded to the first cause of action.

The court made findings in favor of the defendants on both counts of the complaint, setting forth in great detail the facts that it determined had been established by the evidence, and also found in favor of the defendants upon their pleas of the statute of limitations, and that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest. Judgment in favor of the defendants followed accordingly.

The main attack upon the judgment is that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and it is also urged that certain findings are inconsistent with each other, and that the decision is against law. It may be stated at once that while the evidence in the case upon the facts which determined the question of the right of the plaintiff to relief against the defendants was squarely conflicting, there is ample evidence which, if accepted as true by the court, supports its judgment both on the merits and on the bar of the statute. It shows generally that the defendants were employed by the plaintiff to render services as attorneys at law in the probate of the will and administration of the estate of her testator, the defendant Moody, however, attending to this work exclusive of his codefendants. The papers concerning the estate were delivered to him, including the notes and mortgages, and during the time he held them and until the division of the estate among the legatees he attended to renewals of notes or their collection and such matters, and prepared the necessary documents in connection therewith. At the time of such division, however, the securities of the estate, including the Rice note and mortgage, were delivered to the plaintiff or to her colegatees, and they thereafter exercised control over their respective portions thereof.

[1] In such a situation it cannot, of course, be contended that the defendants, as attorneys for the executrix, had any further concern with them, and if by oversight or neglect the plaintiff—to whose share in the division the Rice note and mortgage fell—allowed the statute of limitations to bar an action upon them, such fact, unfortunate though it be, cannot give rise to a claim for damages against the defendants, or either of them. And if this be true, the question of the bar of the statute becomes immaterial, but the court found this also in the defendants' favor.

[2] The same conflict in the evidence prevents a review by this court of the finding in favor of the defendants on the second count.

It was testified to squarely by Moody that the loan was made to him upon his personal note upon the understanding that no security was to be given. This testimony found some support in the physical circumstances of the transaction, and such conflict as there was in the evidence having been resolved in favor of the defendants, this court will not disturb the finding of the trial court.

[3] Moreover, this count of the complaint was founded upon alleged negligence and fraud on the part of the defendants. The negligence, if any, occurred in 1911, and the action was commenced in 1917. The fraud is charged to consist in the representation that the defendant Moody would execute a mortgage to secure his note. Assuming, contrary to the court's finding, that such representation was made, it was made some six years before the commencement of the action. It is sought to avoid the three-year limitation against the action, however, by charging a further false representation on the part of the defendants, namely, that such mortgage had in fact been executed as promised, and was "in the bank," by which plaintiff was lulled into a sense of security. In view of the finding of the court that none of these representations were made, it seems useless to discuss the sufficiency of an averment and proof of such a representation as last made to postpone the setting in motion of the statute of limitations against the fraud by which the loan is charged to have been obtained. Assuming such representation to have been made, the plaintiff had the same means of discovering its falsity at the time it was made as she ultimately employed to that end, and there is no proof of any affirmative action on the part of the defendants to prevent her employing such means at any time. It would seem that the making of such a representation, though false, would not postpone the operation of the statute. Simpson v. Dalziel, 135 Cal. 599, 67 Pac. 1080.

1. Appeal and error — 1208(8)—Delivery of possession of personalty held not to deprive defendant of right to judgment for restitution upon retrial after reversal.

In an action for possession of automobile, the mere delivery of automobile to plaintiff, for whom judgment had been rendered pending appeal did not deprive defendant, where no stay bond had been executed, of right to judgment for restitution of the property on retrial following reversal, even though no order of execution was issued.

2. Appeal and error — 460(1)—Defendant appealing held required to deliver possession of personalty on demand, where no stay bond executed.

On defendant's appeal from judgment for plaintiff in an action for possession of automobile, where no stay bond has been executed, defendant is required to deliver automobile to plaintiff on plaintiff's demand.

3. Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Conflict in evidence for trial court.

A conflict in the evidence was for the trial court to settle.

4. Appeal and error — 1071(6) — Failure to make finding held immaterial.

In an action for possession of automobile by mortgagee against repairman claiming lien under Civ. Code, § 3051, court's failure to make finding as to nonpayment of mortgage debt was immaterial, since the repairman's lien was superior to that of the mortgage lien, so as to entitle repairman to judgment, even though mortgage debt had not been paid.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant. The action was brought by the plaintiff to obtain possession of a certain automobile. In the original complaint filed it was alleged that the plaintiff acquired a lien upon the automobile by reason of a certain chattel mortgage executed by the Chatts. The terms of that mortgage provided that in the event the mortgagors failed to pay the amount of the mortgage debt, plaintiff might take possession of the automobile and proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law; further, that at the time suit was brought the said debt had matured and remained unpaid. Defendant answered, and asserted, in brief, that the automobile had been delivered into his possession by the Chatts, and that, at the request of the latter, repairs had been made upon the machine aggregating in value the sum of $349.40, of which sum nothing had been paid but $10, and that the defendant claimed right to the possession and the lien given him by section 3051 of the Civil Code. The cause was tried, and the court determined that the lien of the chattel mortgage was superior to the lien of the repairman, and gave judgment to the plaintiff for recovery of the automobile. An appeal was taken to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. A rehearing was granted by the Supreme Court and a reversal of the judgment entered by the trial court was ordered; it being last determined that the lien of a repairman is superior to that of a mortgagee. Mortgage Securities Co. v. Pfaffmann, 177 Cal. 109, 169 Pac. 1033, L. R. A. 1918D, 118. Before the second trial was had, which resulted in the judgment here appealed from, plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, alleging, in effect, that subsequent to the first trial the controversy had been settled by the voluntary delivery of the automobile by the defendant to the plaintiff; further, that after obtaining such possession the plaintiff had proceeded to sell the machine after the giving of the usual notices. An answer was filed to this supplemental complaint, which raised an issue as to the settlement having been made of the controversy. The second trial was proceeded with, evidence heard, findings made, and judgment entered. As to the matter concerning the delivery of the automobile by the defendant to the plaintiff, the court determined the facts as follows:

"That at the institution of this suit the defendant refused to deliver to the plaintiff the said automobile, claiming his right to retain the same under section 3051 of the Civil Code of the state of California, and that the above cause first came on for trial in the month of February, 1917, resulting in a judgment for plaintiff, from which an appeal was taken by the defendant to the Supreme Court of the state of California, which afterwards reversed said decision, and that pending said appeal, to wit, on or about June 29, 1917, the defendant delivered to the plaintiff the said automobile after demand had been made therefor by the plaintiff under its judgment rendered in said cause tried in February, 1917, and in pursuance of said demand, the defendant delivered said automobile to the plaintiff, and that no bond was made pending the appeal of said action, but that no consideration or nothing of value whatever was paid or agreed to be paid to the defendant for the delivery of said automobile to the plaintiff, and the said delivery was made in pursuance of the demand by the plaintiff by its duly authorized officer, and that the value of said automobile is the sum of $595. That defendant, from the institution of said action up until said June 29, 1917, continued in possession of said automobile, and it is not true that the defendant at any time, as alleged in the complaint, wrongfully or unlawfully detained said automobile, and it is not true that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession thereof."

The conclusions of law embrace the statement that—

"Defendant did not waive his rights herein by the delivery of said automobile to the plaintiff or its agent."

[1-3] The chief contention made by appellant is that the findings of the court against the allegations of the supplemental complaint are not sustained by the evidence; that is, that the evidence showed a voluntary delivery of the automobile by the defendant to the plaintiff, with intent to satisfy the judgment first rendered by the court and to make a settlement of the controversy. That the mere delivery of the automobile to the plaintiff pending the appeal did not deprive the defendant of the right to have a judgment for restitution of the property upon retrial seems very clear. No stay bond was given, and the plaintiff without doubt had the right, pending an appeal under such circumstances, to require the property to be delivered to it in compliance with the terms of the judgment. The fact that no order or execution was issued upon the judgment does not change the situation, for the law imposed the duty upon the defendant, where execution was not stayed, to deliver the machine to plaintiff upon its demand. In the case of Warner Bros. Co. v. Freud, 131 Cal. 639, 63 Pac. 1017, 82 Am. St. Rep. 400, that question is considered and the court quotes with approval from Freeman on Judgments, § 480a, as follows:

"One against whom a judgment is entered, if he fails to satisfy it, must expect to see his property seized and sold at a sacrifice, and it is difficult to conceive how his payment of the judgment can give rise to any estoppel against his seeking to avoid it for error. The better view, we think, is, that though the execution has not issued, the payment of a judgment must be regarded as compulsory, and therefore as not releasing errors, nor depriving the payor of the right to appeal."

The assertion of appellant that the evidence showed that the automobile was delivered by the defendant to it with the full intent to satisfy the judgment and settle the controversy, is borne out only by the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff. There was other evidence to the contrary submitted by the defendant and a conflict resulted, which, of course, was for the trial court to settle. The testimony of defendant's witnesses on this point, if credited by the trial judge, as we must assume it was, is amply sufficient to sustain the findings adverted to.

[4] A second point made by the appellant is that the court failed to find upon a material issue tendered by the pleadings, to wit, as to the nonpayment of the mortgage debt. It is true that the findings did not cover that matter, but in view of the fact that the trial court properly determined, under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case, the lien of a materialman to be superior to that of a mortgagee, such finding, if made, would not have indicated any different judgment than that entered. The omission, therefore, must be considered here as an immaterial one. There is evidence shown in the record establishing the value of the automobile and the amount of the lien charges held by the defendant against it.

We find no error justifying the claim for reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WON LEE WING. (Cr. 501.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1920.)

Criminal law §1182—Conviction affirmed on conclusive evidence and fair trial.

Where the evidence is overwhelming and conclusive as to the guilt of an appellant, and it appears that his rights were all safeguarded by the lower court and that he had a fair trial, a judgment of conviction will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Won Lee Wing was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, and J. W. Mento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, and he was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon. No argument has been made in this court in his behalf, his counsel concluding, no doubt, in view of the record, that any discussion would be useless. The evidence is overwhelming and conclusive as to his guilt. Indeed, he was greatly favored by the jury in rendering a verdict for the lesser offense. His rights were all safeguarded by the lower court and he had a fair trial.

No reason exists why the verdict should be disturbed, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by Anita I. Hughes and others against Alice Scott and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Robert R. Syer and Owen D. Richardson, both of San Jose, for appellants.

C. L. Witten, of San Jose, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action to quiet title. The facts of the case are undisputed, and are briefly these: Michael Hughes was in his lifetime the owner of the premises in question. He had a son, William I. Hughes, who was the father of the plaintiffs herein, and a daughter, Alice Scott, who is one of the defendants, and he left surviving him his widow, Annie Hughes, another of said defendants. On February 6, 1917, Michael Hughes made a gift deed of the premises in question to his grandson by another child, Leo C. Matthews, granting to the latter a life estate in said property. Following the words of said grant the deed contained this clause:

"In the event of the death of said grantee herein said real property to revert to Alice Scott, my daughter, and to her heirs and assigns, and in the event of the death of said Alice Scott before the death of said grantee herein then said property to revert to the heirs of said grantee."

The habendum clause read as follows:

"To have and to hold all and singular the said premises, together with the appurtenances and privileges thereunto incident unto the said party of the second part during his lifetime and as hereinbefore set forth."

After the death of Michael Hughes this action was commenced by the plaintiffs as his children and heirs to establish and quiet their title to their alleged interest in said property. To the amended complaint filed herein the defendants interposed a demurrer which the trial court sustained, and upon failure or refusal of the plaintiffs to amend judgment was entered in the defendants' favor, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

[1-3] The sole contention of the appellants is that by the clause above quoted from said deed no present interest in said property was conveyed either to Alice Scott or to the heirs of Leo C. Matthews, the grantee named in said deed. The only authority cited by the appellants in support of this contention is the case of McGarrigle v. Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, etc., 145 Cal. 694, 79 Pac. 447, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 315, 104 Am. St. Rep. 84. We think, however, that a clear distinction can be drawn between said case and the case at bar. In that case, after the grant of a life estate in the premises therein involved, the conveyance proceeded with these words:

"It is the purpose of the party of the first part by this deed that, after the death of the party of the second part, the said described lands shall become and be the property of the Roman Catholic Girls' Orphan Asylum of San Francisco."

The Supreme Court held that this clause contained no operative words of grant and amounted to nothing more than an expression of the grantor's purpose in relation to the future disposition of the property, and hence was inoperative to pass a reversionary interest therein. The cases which are cited in the opinion in that case as sustaining this view are found upon examination to be all cases wherein it was clearly the intent of the grantor that the conveyance of such interest should not take effect until after the grantor's death, and hence was void as testamentary in character. In the case at bar, however, the clause of the deed in question does contain words and phrases which are in the nature of operative words of grant, such as these: That in the event of the death of the grantee in said deed the said real property should "revert to Alice Scott, my daughter, and to her heirs and assigns," and also the clause providing that in the event of the death of said Alice Scott before the death of said grantee said real property should "revert to the heirs of said grantee." In the habendum clause of said deed there is also an expression indicating the intent of the grantor to make a present disposition of the reversion in said property. It is a well-established rule of construction that all parts of a deed must be considered together and so construed as to give effect and meaning to every part thereof if possible. Civ. Code, § 1641. It is also well settled that the primary object of all interpretation of conveyances is to ascertain and carry out the intention of the parties thereto. Civ. Code, § 1636; Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 178, 86 Pac. 603; Jacobs v. All Persons, 12 Cal. App. 163, 106 Pac. 896.

The case last cited strongly resembles the case at bar in respect to the language of the conveyance involved, since after the grant of a life estate in the property the deed there in question proceeded to state "and upon and at the time of her death the title to all of said property shall pass to and be vested in" certain specified persons. This court construed said deed as conveying a life estate to the immediate grantee named therein with remainder over to the other persons to whom by the terms of said deed the said property was to pass upon the termination of the life estate. In so deciding, this court cited with approval the cases of Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049, Burnett v. Piercy, supra, Henderson v. Mack, 82 Ky. 379, Carson v. McCaslin, 60 Ind. 335, and Caldwell v. Hammons, 40 Ga. 342, in each of which the terms of the grant and reversion were similar to those in the conveyance in question here. These cases indicate what we think is the better rule to be applied to the construction of the clauses in the deed here under review, and in accordance therewith we are of the opinion that the trial court was not in error in sustaining the defendants' demurrer to the plaintiffs' amended complaint.

This being so, the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

WILLITS v. HELMER et al. (Civ. 3306.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 1, 1920.)

1. Evidence — 589—Court properly disregarded defendants' testimony where surrounded with elements of uncertainty and suspicion.

In an action to declare a trust in land, court held justified in disregarding testimony of defendants that they had property of their own, where such testimony was surrounded with elements of uncertainty, improbability, and suspicion.

2. Appeal and error — 1078(4)—Appellate court will not search record for grounds of alleged errors.

Claims of error in refusing to grant motions to dismiss as to a certain defendant and to grant such defendant's motion for a nonsuit will not be considered, where neither argument nor authority nor any reference to the evidence whatever is urged in support, as the court cannot be expected to search the record for grounds of such alleged errors.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by M. L. Willits, by guardian ad litem, against Emma L. Helmer, also known as E. L. Helmer, Bertha Helmer, and others. M. L. Willits dying after the institution of the action, suit was continued in the name of the administrator of his estate, H. G. Willits. From an adverse judgment, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Griffith Jones and John J. Craig, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted during the lifetime of one M. L. Willits, now deceased, through his guardian ad litem to have it determined that the defendants held certain real property which, it was alleged, had been purchased with funds belonging to the plaintiff, to have a trust thereon declared in his favor, and to also obtain an accounting for certain other moneys and property alleged to have been received by certain of the defendants from said plaintiff under the circumstances set forth at length in the complaint. Shortly after the institution of the action M. L. Willits died, and the suit was continued in the name of the administrator of his estate. Upon the trial of the cause the court made its findings and conclusions of law in the plaintiff's favor, and judgment was accordingly rendered, establishing such trust and directing such accounting. The defendant Bertha Helmer appeals.

[1] The facts of the case, briefly stated, are these: The defendant Emma L. Helmer, daughter of the appellant herein, became acquainted with said M. L. Willits during the year 1911 at Clinton, Iowa, and in the month of November of that year the said M. L. Willits came with the Helmer family to San Diego, Cal., and thereafter was an inmate of the family up to a short while before his death. Willits at the time of his arrival in California was well along in years and had considerable means in the form of money and also in the form of a valuable piece of property in Illinois, a portion of which latter property he sold in the year 1912 for the sum of $14,000, and the remainder of which he conveyed to the defendant Emma L. Helmer by a deed executed in April, 1914, but which was not recorded until after his death. It is alleged in the complaint, and found by the court, that between the date of the arrival of said M. L. Willits in California and the latter part of the year 1914, the said Emma L. Helmer obtained from him sums of money at various times aggregating in all about $20,000, and that she also obtained from him the deed to the farm in Illinois, through undue influence and while he was of unsound mind. It is also alleged in the complaint, and found by the trial court, that a large part of the money thus obtained from him was invested by said Emma L. Helmer in those certain pieces of real estate which are sought to be impressed with a trust. The findings of the trial court are quite full and detailed with respect to the history of the relation between M. L. Willits and the Helmer family from the year 1911 to 1914. The appellant does not in the main attack these findings in such a way as to require us to go into a detailed consideration of the question as to whether they are sustained by the evidence in the case. The chief contention of the appellant seems to be that the evidence is insufficient to justify that portion of finding 4, wherein the trial court, dealing with the question as to whether the real properties purchased by the defendant Emma L. Helmer were bought with money received from said Willits, or were purchased, as the defendants claimed, with money belonging to Emma L. Helmer and Bertha Helmer before they came to California, stated in said finding "that the said Emma L. Helmer and the said Bertha Helmer had no property of any substantial value." It is true that both of these defendants testified that Emma L. Helmer had approximately the sum of $1,200 in her possession when she came to California, and that her mother, Bertha Helmer, had at the same time the sum of about $9,000 in money, and that these moneys had been invested in some real estate; but an examination of the record shows that this testimony on the part of said defendants was so surrounded with the elements of uncertainty, improbability, and suspicion as to have entirely justified the trial court in disregarding it.

Upon the question of the undue influence exercised by the Helmers over said Willits it is not necessary to set forth in detail the history of that branch of the case, since the Supreme Court of this state in the Matter of the Estate of M. L. Willits, deceased, 175 Cal. 173, 165 Pac. 537, has fully reviewed the identical evidence which was introduced in that case and also in this one, in dealing with the relations between the parties and the extent of the undue influence which was exercised by Emma L. Helmer over said Willits in procuring a will to be executed by him in her favor; and in concluding such review the court quite aptly says:

"It would be a serious reflection upon the intelligence of the profession if space should be given to a discussion of the sufficiency or insufficiency of this evidence to support the verdict. It speaks so positively and convincingly as to require no comment."

[2] As to the other points made by the appellant herein they require no extended consideration. The appellant urges as errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the defendants the alleged failure of the court "to grant defendant Bertha Helmer's motion to dismiss said action as to said defendant," and also "the court's failure to grant defendants' motion for a nonsuit"; but neither argument nor authority, nor any reference to the evidence whatsoever, is urged in support of either of these contentions, and this court cannot be expected to search the record for grounds of such alleged errors which the appellant has altogether failed to urge.

Judgment affirmed.

WILLIAMSON v. HARDY. (Civ. 3312.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1920.)

1. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 108½—Asking jurors as a body whether interested in company indemnifying defendant not error.

In an action for damages for personal injuries, that plaintiff asked the jurors as a body whether or not they were "owners of stock in the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation," could not, standing alone, be held to furnish a basis for reversal; the indemnity company, surety for the defendant, not being a party.

2. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 127—Statement of plaintiff's counsel concerning surety for defendant in negligence case not error.

In a negligence case, where plaintiff's counsel, during the trial, when a question arose with regard to the production of certain X-ray photographs which were in the possession of the physician of a surety company indemnifying defendant, not a party to the action, referred to such fact, there was no error justifying a reversal of the case, where the court instructed the jury to disregard the remarks.

3. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 471(13)—Testimony as to actions and conduct of injured person admissible.

In an action for personal injuries, court did not err in permitting witnesses for plaintiff to testify as to their observation of her actions and conduct after the date of her injuries and during a period of a year and a half; the witnesses merely testifying to matters of personal observation and not undertaking to testify as to any conclusions drawn by them therefrom as to the seriousness of her injury.

4. Negligence $\hookrightarrow$ 136(15)—Care as to meat market customer slipping on floor held for jury.

In an action for injuries from slipping upon the floor of defendant's meat market, whether defendant was negligent in permitting a piece of oiled paper, made slippery by the adhesion to it of scraps of fresh meat, to be lying on the floor where customers were required to walk, held for the jury.

5. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 295(1)—Instructions to be considered as a whole.

Where the instructions are full and fair upon the whole, criticism aimed at particular and isolated portions is without merit.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Agnes Williamson against Charles S. Hardy. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, and Eugene Daney, of San Diego, for appellant.

Crouch & Chambers, of San Diego, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for damages arising out of injuries sustained by her through having slipped and fallen upon the floor of the defendant's meat market in the city of San Diego, her said fall having been occasioned, according to plaintiff's averments, by the slippery and unsafe condition of said floor.

[1, 2] The case was tried before a jury, and the first contention of the appellant is that during the proceedings for obtaining the jury, and also upon several occasions during the trial of the cause, counsel for plaintiff were guilty of misconduct in seeking to bring before the jury the fact that the action was being defended by a surety company which, though not a party to the action, was the insurer of the defendant against claims for damages. As to the alleged misconduct of counsel for the plaintiff during the process of procuring the jury, it is conceded by counsel for the appellant that it is not error to inquire of the jurors if they are stockholders or interested in a certain surety company. It would seem, therefore, that the question which was put to the jurors as a body to the point whether or not they were "the owners of stock in the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation," by counsel for the plaintiff, cannot, standing alone, be held to furnish a basis for the appellant's claim. But the appellant insists that upon several occasions during the trial counsel for plaintiff persisted in making statements in the presence of the jury regarding the surety company in question which, taken in connection with the question asked upon their voir dire examination, showed a persistent intent to impress the jury with the fact that the action was being defended by said surety company. Upon an examination of the record in this regard we fail to find a sufficient basis for this claim. It is true that at one time during the trial some question arose with regard to the production of certain X-ray photographs which were in the possession of the physician of the surety company, and this led counsel for the plaintiff to refer to that fact; but we find in that connection that the court instructed the jury to disregard the remarks of counsel for plaintiff in that respect, and we can find no reason in the record for assuming that the jury disregarded that instruction. Nor do we feel that plaintiff's counsel were so far guilty of willful misconduct in connection with that episode as to justify a reversal of the case.

[3] The appellant's second contention is that the trial court committed error in permitting several witnesses who were called by the plaintiff to testify as to their observation of her actions and conduct after the date of her injuries and during a period of a year and a half or so thereafter. An inspection of the record discloses that these several witnesses merely testified to matters of personal observation, and did not undertake to testify as to any conclusions drawn by them therefrom as to the seriousness of her preceding injuries. It requires no citation of authority to sustain the view that evidence of this kind is admissible, and that objections thereto go not to the admissibility of such evidence but as to its weight; and as to the weight of such evidence the jury was the sole judge.

[4] The appellant's third contention is that upon all of the evidence in the case the court should have granted the defendant's request for a directed verdict. There is no merit in this contention. Taking the plaintiff's positive testimony that she slipped and fell upon the floor of the defendant's market through having stepped upon a piece of oiled paper made slippery by the adhesion to it of scraps of fresh meat, it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not the defendant was negligent in permitting such a substance to be lying upon the floor of his market where customers were wont and were required to walk while making their purchases therein.

[5] Finally, the appellant objects to the alleged error of the court in the giving and refusal of certain instructions. The defendant's requested instructions which the court refused to give were those which would have required the jury to bring a directed verdict in the defendant's favor, and as to these, as already stated, there was no error. As to the instructions which the court gave upon the general phases of the case, we find that upon the whole they are quite full and fair, and are not subject to the criticism which the appellant aims at particular and isolated portions of said instructions, and hence that appellant's final contention in this regard is without merit.

No errors appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte SANDERS. (Cr. 911.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 5, 1920.)

1. Prisons $\Leftrightarrow$ 15—Credits for good conduct forfeited for crime while upon parole.

One on parole is constructively a prisoner, and has the civil status of a prisoner; and, where he violates the conditions of his parole, the board of prison directors may forfeit his credits for good conduct which had already been earned, under Pen. Code, § 1588.

2. Forgery $\Leftrightarrow$ 5—Implies evil intent.

The crime of forgery implies an evil intent; the two being inseparable.

3. Prisons $\Leftrightarrow$ 15—Credits which might be earned in future may be forfeited.

Pen. Code, § 1588, gives the board of prison directors power to forfeit a prisoner's credits for good conduct which might be earned in the future.

Application by Russell Sanders for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure release on ground of illegal detention. Writ denied.

Russell Sanders, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. and John H. Rioridan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. The petitioner applied for a writ of habeas corpus, alleging that he was illegally restrained of his liberty by the warden of the state penitentiary. Upon the hearing, it appeared that the petitioner, as prisoner No. 30164, was received at San Quentin Prison, December 21, 1916, from Los Angeles county, for the crime of forgery, under sentence to serve a term of 4 years and 6 months. On this term he was allowed the credits provided for under section 1588 of the Penal Code and the allowance of said credits reduced the term to a net sentence of 3 years, 3 months, and 15 days, entitling him to discharge under that judgment and commitment on April 6, 1920. On that date, April 6, 1920, he was discharged as convict No. 30164, but has since been held in prison by virtue of another judgment and commitment under which he was received in prison on April 6, 1913, as prisoner No. 26423 from the county of Santa Barbara, for the crime of forgery under the sentence of 8 years. The sentence imposed in Los Angeles county in 1916 was imposed to run concurrently with the first term, and was imposed while the petitioner was on parole.

On June 30, 1916, the petitioner, while serving the 8-year sentence, was released on parole. On December 16, 1916, the state board of prison directors ordered the parole of the petitioner revoked. Thereafter he was carried as a parole violator until he was returned to the prison on December 21, 1916, at which time he was received, as before stated, from Los Angeles county on a judgment of conviction of a similar crime.

On January 27, 1917, the board of prison directors heard charges preferred by the state parole officer, charging the petitioner with a violation of his parole. The prisoner was called before the board, and the charge explained to him, and he admitted it to be true. The board of prison directors thereupon adopted a resolution, ordering forfeiture of all credits earned or to be earned by petitioner on the sentence he was serving when he was paroled, as a result of which order petitioner is required to serve the 8-year sentence which he began serving on April 6, 1913. This 8-year term, with the 5 days lost from December 16, 1916, the day his parole was revoked, until December 21, 1916, the day he was returned to prison, requires his being held in custody until April 11, 1921.

[1] The petitioner's position is that the board of prison directors had no power to forfeit his credits for good conduct which had already been earned on his first sentence and which would thereafter be earned by him on said sentence because of the commission of the second crime while upon parole. While the petitioner was on parole, he was constructively a prisoner; he had the civil status of a prisoner. Section 1588, Penal Code, provides that "every convict who shall have no infraction of the rules and regulations of the prison, or laws of the state, recorded against him * * * shall be allowed from his term" certain credits. Said section also provides that—

"Each convict shall be held entitled to these deductions, unless the board of directors shall find that for misconduct or other cause he should not receive them."

The section also provides that—

"If any convict * * * in any manner violate any of the rules and regulations of the prison, he shall forfeit all deductions of time earned by him for good conduct before the commission of such offense, or that, under this section, he may earn in the future, or shall forfeit such part of such deductions as to the board of directors may seem just."

The "ticket of leave" under which the prisoner was released from the prison set forth the conditions which must be observed by the paroled prisoner under penalty of being returned to prison. These conditions include, of course, an observance of all the laws of the state. The prisoner violated a condition of his parole, and in doing so he violated a prison regulation. Having violated a law of the state during the period of his sentence, he forfeited his right to the credits for good conduct.

[2] The minutes of the board of prison directors show that the petitioner was brought before the board, and the charge of forgery explained to him, which he admitted, whereupon, by resolution of said board, his credits, past and future, were forfeited. Petitioner urges that he was not charged with evil intent. The crime itself implies an evil intent; the two are inseparable.

[3] The petitioner argues that as a matter of public policy, section 1588, Penal Code, should be so construed as to give to the board of directors no power to forfeit credits which might be earned in the future, as such a procedure leaves a prisoner without hope and without incentive to good conduct. This is indeed unfortunate, but there are numerous considerations of public policy connected with the question, one of the most important being that paroled prisoners shall not violate their paroles. For the purpose of accomplishing this result, it is desirable that the board have power to inflict such penalties as will act as a deterrent. There is no doubt that under the powers given the board by section 1588, Penal Code, if petitioner had broken a law of the state while actually confined in the penitentiary, the board would have had the power to forfeit his credits, past and future, upon the term he was then serving. He cannot be in a better position by reason of the fact that at the time of his offense he was being extended special privileges by the board under its powers to parole prisoners. The writ is denied, and the prisoner is remanded to the custody of the warden of the state penitentiary.

Ex parte GOTTSCHALK. (Cr. 513.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1920.)

1. Criminal law — 258(4) — Cannot change judgment to defendant's prejudice after commencement of execution of sentence.

An order, after defendant was taken into custody under a judgment giving him the option of avoiding the imprisonment by payment of the fine, which withdrew the option and directed imprisonment of defendant, changed the judgment to the defendant's prejudice after the beginning of the sentence, though the original order required payment of the fine forthwith, and was beyond the power of the justice of the peace.

2. Habeas corpus — 92(1) — Statement of case on appeal from justice can be considered on habeas corpus after new trial was denied.

The statement of the case by the justice of the peace on appeal to the superior court is part of the judgment record in the superior court, and, if new trial is denied, that statement can be considered on habeas corpus proceedings in the Court of Appeals to determine whether the justice court exceeded its jurisdiction.

Application by William Gottschalk for writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the sheriff of Yolo County to secure release of custody under a commitment of a justice of the peace. Petitioner discharged.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, and C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. It appears from the statement of the facts accompanying the petition that one J. H. Anderson labored as a dredgerman for the Dutton Dredging Company from 12 o'clock noon on April 30th, until about 7 a. m. on the seventh day of May. His working hours were so disposed that he worked 24 hours in each 3 days, not working, however, the same number of hours each day. Up to 12 o'clock noon on May 6th he had worked 48 hours. His only work during the seventh 24 hours was from midnight until 7 a. m. on May 7th, when he voluntarily quit work. This lacks 1 hour of being 7 full days. The company paid him for 7 days and 1 hour in conformity with his claim that he worked on the last day until 9 a. m. The check which he received was for $26.30, which overpaid him in the sum of about 20 cents. He claimed that he should have received about $3 more, but his own figures do not justify this claim.

At the time that he quit work the foreman made out and delivered to him a time check for $26.30, which check he accepted without making any claim that the amount was too small. With reference to this time check he testified as follows:

"I told him [the foreman] that I would call at the office of the company in San Francisco and collect the money. Afterwards I changed my mind, and went to Sacramento instead. I did not tell the foreman that I had gone to Sacramento until several days later. The day after going to Sacramento I sent my time check to the Dredgermen's Union in San Francisco, and left it there for collection. I received the check for $26.30 about the same day that I swore to the complaint."

The time check was not presented to the company until about May 21st, and it was paid to the Dredgermen's Union on May 22d. The money did not reach the complainant until the following day. The defendant himself resides in San Francisco, and he did not have any dealings directly with Anderson. The latter did not at any time notify the company that he wanted any new provision to be made about the payment of the time check. The justice of the peace found the defendant guilty, and pronounced judgment.

[1] The judgment, as originally entered, gave the defendant the option of avoiding the imprisonment by the payment of the fine. Later, however, the justice entered an order, purporting to withdraw the option and directing the imprisonment of the defendant. This order was made after the defendant was taken into custody. It is true that the order directed that the fine be paid "forthwith," but all fines are payable forthwith, and the use of that word added nothing to the legal effect of the judgment. It is held in Ex parte Sullivan, 3 Cal. App. 193, 84 Pac. 781, that a justice of the peace has no power, after the commencement of the execution of a judgment to vary its terms adversely to the defendant.

The petitioner is discharged.

HART, J. I concur in the judgment, but am of the opinion that one point not considered in the main opinion should be given some notice.

[2] At the oral argument and in the briefs, the question whether, upon habeas corpus, this court may, in a case cognizable in justices' or police courts, examine the facts as embraced in the statement on appeal to the superior court was discussed and vigorously affirmed by the petitioner, and likewise denied by the Attorney General.

Section 1468 of the Penal Code, which is embraced within the chapter and title of the Penal Code regulating the matter of appeals in misdemeanor cases from justices' and police courts, provides:

"The appeal to the superior court from the judgment of a justice's or police court is heard upon a statement of the case settled by the justice or police judge, embodying such rulings of the court as are excepted to, which statement must be filed with and settled by the court within ten days after filing notice of appeal."

I am of the opinion that the statement on appeal from a justice's or police court to the superior court in criminal cases, the triable jurisdiction of which is in the first-named courts, constitutes a part of the judgment roll or judgment record of the case in the superior court, where a new trial is denied. I am therefore of the opinion that, upon habeas corpus, in a criminal case so appealed to the superior court, where a new trial has been denied, it is competent and proper for this court to look into the facts as they are presented in the statement on appeal to the superior court for the purpose of aiding us in the determination of the question whether the justice's court exceeded its jurisdiction in the pronouncement of judgment of imprisonment. I do not herein intend to intimate how far this or the superior court would be permitted to go in this respect in a proceeding on habeas corpus where, upon a judgment of conviction and sentence in the justice's or police court, there has been no appeal to the superior court and the petition for the writ is based entirely on the proceedings in the said inferior court.

It follows that, in this case, this court was legally authorized to examine the facts contained in the statement on appeal to the superior court, and that for the reason stated in the main opinion the petitioner is entitled to his discharge.

I concur: BURNETT, J.

WILKINSON v. ROHRER et al. (Civ. 3093.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 5, 1920.)

Municipal corporations §705(11)—Negligence of plaintiff which did not contribute to the accident no ground for denying recovery.

Although plaintiff, in turning off at an intersecting street, passed to the left of the center in violation of the Motor Vehicle Law, such negligence will not bar recovery where, after he had passed the corner and was on the right side of the street, he was struck by defendant's car proceeding at an excessive rate of speed on the wrong side of the street; plaintiff's original negligence not being the proximate cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by J. C. Wilkinson against Ralph G. Rohrer and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Shreve & Shreve and Ralph F. Twombly, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Heskett & Sample, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In a collision between the automobile of plaintiff and that of defendants, the car of the former was damaged, for the recovery of which he brought this action, and obtained a judgment for $299, from which defendants have appealed.

Among other defenses interposed by defendants was that of contributory negligence of plaintiff, as to which the court made an adverse finding, and the sole ground here urged for a reversal is that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

It appears from the evidence that plaintiff was driving his car east on Bush street in the city of San Diego and, upon arriving at the intersection of Goldfinch street, which runs north and south, he turned into the same, going north. In making the turn he, instead of going to the right of the center of the intersection of the two streets, as required by the Motor Vehicle Act, entered Goldfinch street, passing to the left of said center, thus "cutting the corner." At the same time defendants were, on Goldfinch street, approaching from the north, driving their car southerly on the left-hand side of the street at a speed of some 40 miles per hour, all in violation of the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, c. 147). The collision of the two cars occurred at a point in Goldfinch street about 20 feet north of the north line of Bush street and on the east side of the center of Goldfinch street.

That plaintiff was guilty of negligence by reason of the line of travel followed in turning from Bush street into Goldfinch street may be admitted. But such fact will not bar his recovery, unless it be made to appear that such negligence was a part of the efficient cause of the collision; that is, there must have been a causal connection between his negligence in so doing and the injury complained of. At the time when the collision occurred, as shown by the record, plaintiff was driving his car upon the right-hand side of the center of the street, where he was entitled to travel, and the fact that in reaching such position he had negligently cut across the corner of the intersecting street was not a contributing cause of the collision, but, as appears from the evidence, wholly disconnected therefrom. Clearly he was where he had a right to be and where, but for the fact that defendants were on the wrong side of the street and traveling at an unlawful rate of speed, the collision would not have occurred.

The judgment is affirmed.

HILL v. MOORE et al. (Civ. 3083.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1920.)

1. Pleading $\S$ 345(1)—Court erred in rendering judgment for plaintiff on the pleadings in action on note where answer alleged payment.

In action on note, where answer alleged that the principal and interest had been fully paid, court erred in entering judgment on the pleadings; such payment constituting a sufficient defense.

2. Pleading $\S$ 350(3)—Affirmative allegations of answer deemed true on motion for judgment on pleadings.

Matters affirmatively set up in the answer must, on plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, be deemed true.

3. Bills and notes $\S$ 432—Transfer of leasehold interest in consideration of release from note precluded recovery thereon.

Where purchasers of lease who had executed note as part of the purchase price transferred their interest in the lease to third person in consideration of seller releasing them from the note, seller could not recover on note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; E. A. Luce, Judge.

Action by M. G. Hill against M. Moore and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellants.

Dan V. Noland, of Los Angeles, and J. S. Larew, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment entered against them upon the pleadings.

The action was upon a promissory note for $600, the making of which is admitted. Defendants in their answer not only denied the allegation of the complaint "that no part of the principal sum, nor interest, or attorney's fee therein provided has been paid," but affirmatively alleged that the whole thereof has been fully paid, and denied "that the whole thereof, or any part thereof, is now due or owing or unpaid," and as a further defense alleged that the note in question was given as a part of the consideration in the purchase of a lease of real estate transferred by plaintiff to defendants, and that thereafter defendants sold and assigned their interest in the said lease and the crops growing upon the demised premises to F. M. Griffith and H. W. Thompson, and that, as a part of the consideration for the sale and transfer thereof so made, plaintiff at the time agreed with defendants that they should be released from the payment of said $600 note, which should be returned to them.

[1-3] It thus appears the answer not only contained an express denial of the material allegation contained in the complaint as to nonpayment, but specifically alleged that the entire amount of principal and interest due upon the note had been fully paid. This alone constituted a sufficient defense to the allegations of the complaint. Moreover, the matters affirmatively set up in the answer must, under the motion for judgment upon the pleadings, be deemed to be true. McGowan v. Ford, 107 Cal. 177, 40 Pac. 281; Bradford Investment Co. v. Joost, 117 Cal. 211, 48 Pac. 1083. And, since it is alleged that a part of the consideration for defendants' transfer and assignment of the lease was plaintiff's agreement to release them from the payment of the note, proof of such fact would constitute a sufficient defense to plaintiff's right to recover on the note.

That the court erred in granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings, followed by entry of the judgment therein, admits of no possible question.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

STERN, Superintendent of Banks, v. SUNSET ROAD OIL CO. et al. (Civ. 3196.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 3, 1920.)

1. Sales $\S$ 62 — Divisibility of contract dependent not only on number and separability of items, but upon object and intention.

A contract to supply a railroad company with oil and two supplemental agreements held not to be a divisible contract to furnish oil on the one hand for storage and on the other for current use; divisibility depending not alone upon the multiplicity or separability of items, but upon the parties' intention and the contract's object.

2. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 49(1)—Recoupment proper where cause of action on assigned demands, and defendant's right against assignor originated in same indivisible contract.

Where plaintiff's cause of action on assigned demands for the delivery of current use oil to defendant and defendant's right to recoup on account of money advanced to plaintiff's assignor grew out of the same subject-matter and same indivisible contract, recoupment was proper.

3. Set-off and counterclaim $\S$ 50 — Assignee held to take subject to debtor's right of recoupment.

Where an oil company contracted to furnish oil for a railroad company and by supplemental agreement the latter advanced the former money for development, and the former assigned demands on the latter to plaintiff, and after notice of assignment committed a breach of contract, the defendant railroad company could recoup for money advanced to assignor in assignee's action begun after the breach, although assignee did not have notice of advance of development money, since assignee took subject to the equities and defenses covered by the entire indivisible contract and with knowledge of defendant's common-law right of recoupment.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡50—"Set-off" distinguished from "recoupment" as respects assignor's breach of contract after assignment.

A "set-off" is a creation of statute, while a "recoupment" existed at common law; the former applies to different contracts, while the latter flows from the same contract which forms the foundation of plaintiff's claim, and where plaintiff's right is by assignment, if assignor's breach occurred prior to notice, defendant would have the right to set off (Code Civ. Proc. § 268), but, if subsequent, he would not, while in recoupment the time of breach would be immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Recoupment; Set-Off.]

5. Set-off and counterclaim ⚡21 — Party to contract held not estopped to assert recoupment against assignee.

Where assignor contracted to furnish oil to defendant railroad company and assigned demands to a bank to which the defendant made some payments, defendant was not estopped to recoup for money advanced to assignor previous to assignment which it failed to inform assignee about, since the evidence does not show assignee informed defendant it had or would advance money, and defendant could assume it was fully informed, since its director was a general manager of assignor.

6. Estoppel ⚡95—Where party failed to perform obligation to disclose facts, there can be no estoppel.

Where party claiming estoppel is under as great obligation to inform the person sought to be estopped of the real facts as the latter is to inform himself, there is no estoppel.

7. Estoppel ⚡95—Silence will not estop where there is no duty to speak.

It must be shown that there was an intentional and deliberate declaration, act, or omission on the part of the party sought to be estopped, amounting to intentional deceit or gross negligence, and silence, to constitute estoppel, must be willful or culpable, and result in another placing himself in an unfavorable position on the faith in or understanding of a fact, which the person remaining silent can contradict, but silence will not estop where there is no duty to speak.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Kern Valley Bank against the Sunset Road Oil Company and the San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company, in which W. R. Williams, as Superintendent of Banks, and later his successor in office, Charles F. Stern, were each in turn substituted as plaintiff. The Oil Company defaulted, and from a judgment for plaintiff against the defendant Railroad Company, the latter appeals. Reversed.

Dana T. Smith, of Salt Lake City, Utah, and E. E. Bennett and A. S. Halsted, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. E. Whitaker and T. N. Harvey, both of Bakersfield, and Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Judge pro tem. This action was originally commenced by the Kern Valley Bank. Prior to trial W. R. Williams, superintendent of banks, was substituted as plaintiff; he then having charge of the affairs of said Kern Valley Bank for the purposes of liquidation. Later Williams was succeeded as superintendent of banks by Charles F. Stern, and the latter was thereupon substituted as plaintiff and respondent. The action concerns the sale and delivery of oil. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company for the sum of $8,926.35, plus $5,908.25 interest, from which judgment said defendant railroad company appeals.

The facts are substantially without conflict, and are as follows: On July 1, 1907, defendant Sunset Road Oil Company, a corporation, and its subsidiary corporation, Operators' Oil Company, contracted in writing with the defendant San Pedro, Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company to sell and deliver to the latter all oil required for the use of said railroad company for a period of five years, 200,000 barrels of which was to be stored prior to January 1, 1908, and the remainder to be delivered to and used by said railroad company for current use. Payments were to be made not later than the 15th of each calendar month for all deliveries made during the preceding calendar month. Said contract also contained provisions relating to the character of oil, the temperature deductions, etc. Later said contract was supplemented by two other agreements, the first of which is not material here. The second was executed February 4, 1908, and by proper recitals was made a part of the original contract. The two important features of the second supplemental agreement were: First, the postponement of the date for the commencement of the delivery of the storage oil until April 1, 1908, deliveries to be made thereafter daily at the rate of not less than three or more than ten carloads per day until the full amount of said storage oil was delivered; secondly, the acknowledgment by said oil companies of the payment to them by said railroad company of the sum of $60,000 on account of future deliveries of storage oil.

It was also provided in said second supplemental agreement that all payments for current use oil delivered after April 1, 1908, should be paid for in accordance with the provisions of the original agreement—that is, not later than the 15th of each calendar month.

On April 8, 1908, said oil companies assigned the payments due them under said contract to the Kern Valley Bank, in consideration for which said bank agreed to and afterwards did advance to said oil companies the sum of 25 cents a barrel on all oil shipped to said railroad company. At the time of said assignment said bank had no knowledge of the existence of said second supplemental agreement, nor of the payment to said oil companies by said railroad company of said sum of $60,000; its knowledge of the transaction between said oil companies and said railroad company being confined to the contents of the original agreement. Notice of said assignment was given to said railroad company by means of a letter, written on April 8, 1908, by the representative of said oil companies to said railroad company, in the form following:

"Please pay to the Kern Valley Bank of Bakersfield, California, at due dates, the proceeds of all oil heretofore shipped to you by us and that may be hereafter so shipped, terms our contract with you. This order to remain in full force and effect until revoked by us with the consent of said Kern Valley Bank. Please make formal acknowledgment of the within order to the Kern Valley Bank and oblige."

Said railroad company replied by letter to said notice, and, after acknowledging receipt of said letter of April 8th, stated:

"I am returning this order herewith under advice of our Legal Department, for necessary correction. We cannot accept any orders for 'future payments'; in other words, a separate order should be given covering each month's voucher, and sufficient identification carried in the order with reference to your invoices as to distinctly identify the payments. * * * If you will kindly arrange to take action as suggested above, I will in the meantime issue instructions that vouchers be rendered to your company for payment through the Kern Valley Bank. In the meantime please let me have corrected order covering payment for month of April, and let future orders come in as suggested."

Said railroad company received no notice whatever from said bank concerning said assignment, nor did it have knowledge at any time of the existence of the agreement made by the bank with said oil companies, or of the advancements made or to be made by said bank of 25 cents a barrel on all oil shipped to said railroad company.

On April 15 and 16, 1908, said railroad company paid to said bank, on invoices for oil, duly assigned to said bank by having stamped twice thereon the words "Payable to the Kern Valley Bank, Bakersfield," the sums of $1,634.78 and $2,685.07, respectively, which payments were in full for all current use oil delivered prior to March 31, 1908. On May 22, 1908, said bank made demand upon said railroad company for payment of oil delivered subsequent to April 11, 1908, to which said railroad company replied by letter on May 28, 1908, to the effect that said oil companies had defaulted in their contract, and that there was nothing due said oil companies.

On November 5, 1910, this action was commenced for an accounting, to ascertain the amount of oil delivered under said contract, and to obtain a judgment against said railroad company for the amount of oil delivered, and also to obtain a judgment against the defendant Sunset Road Oil Company for the difference between the amount found to be due from said railroad company and the amount advanced by said bank to said oil companies. Said oil companies delivered no storage oil whatever, nor did they deliver current use oil of the quality or in the quantity required, said railroad company being obliged to purchase 75 per cent. of its current use oil from outside sources. Neither did said oil companies ever repay to said railroad company any part of said sum of $60,000, but against that sum said railroad company has allowed a credit of $10,905.23 for current use oil delivered subsequent to April 1, 1908, and for which no payment had been made.

The complaint alleges, on information and belief, that the total value of the oil delivered to said railroad company subsequent to April 11, 1908, was approximately $15,000, of which said bank advanced the sum of $14,125, and that $4,309 has been paid, leaving a balance due of $11,000, or thereabouts. The defendant Sunset Road Oil Company defaulted. The defendant railroad company answered by joining issue as to the value of the total shipments of oil, the amount claimed to have been advanced by said bank to said oil companies, and the assignment to said bank. It denied that it had received notice of said assignment, as alleged in the complaint, or that it had accepted or agreed to accept the same, or that it had made any payments pursuant to said assignment, but admitted that it had made payments to said bank for oil shipped prior to April 1, 1908. As a special defense it was averred that said oil companies had defaulted in the performance of their contract, by reason of which nothing was due or payable to said oil companies subsequent to April 1, 1908, at which time it was alleged said oil companies were, and that they still are, indebted to said railroad company, in excess of the sum of $40,000; in other words, the answer sets up, in addition to other defenses, its right to recoupment under the terms of said original and supplemental agreements. The trial court found that said railroad company, by reason of its conduct at the time of and subsequent to the notice of assignment, was estopped from urging its defense of recoupment, and judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff.

Two principal questions are presented by the appeal: First, whether or not appellant may recoup itself against plaintiff to the extent of its claim against plaintiff's assignor, occasioned by the total failure of said assignor to deliver storage oil paid for in full; and, second, if it may so recoup itself, whether or not, under the facts shown by the record, appellant is estopped by reason of its conduct from urging that defense.

[1, 2] The availability of the defense of recoupment depends primarily upon the nature of the contract. If, as contended by appellant, it is an entire contract, and not a divisible one, it is quite clear that it is a proper case for recoupment. This proposition is not seriously disputed. Respondent argues that the contract is a divisible one, not that the original and the two supplemental agreements do not constitute one contract, but that the contract covers two separate obligations, distinct from each other, viz. an agreement to deliver storage oil, and an agreement to deliver current use oil, and that, since the storage oil was paid for in advance, such payment cannot now be used as the foundation for recoupment in the matter of the delivery of and the payment for the current use oil.

We are of the opinion that the terms of the contract and the circumstances of its execution do not support this view. The divisibility of the contract does not alone depend upon the multiplicity or the separability of the items therein, but upon the intention of the parties and the object of the contract. If it was the intention of the parties to treat the contract as an entire contract, and it appears that their engagements would not have been entered into except upon the clear understanding that the full object of the contract should be performed, it is not a divisible contract, and the contracting parties will not be allowed, under those circumstances, to perform part of the contract and default in its other parts without being held answerable for the performance of the entire contract. Parsons on Contracts, vol. 2 (9th Ed.) p. 517; Page on Contracts, vol. 3, p. 2289; 6 Rul. Case Law, 858; 13 Corp. Jur. 562.

The evidence here shows that the defendant railroad company was in need of oil to operate its railroad. It was not in the business of buying and selling oil. The oil contracted for was purchased for its own use and consumption. It was necessary that it should be continuously supplied with oil for its immediate and future use. A supply of current use oil without a supply of storage oil would have been of little value. Both were necessary to the successful operation of its railroad business. At the time of the execution of the contract the oil fields belonging to said oil companies were apparently new and undeveloped. Money was needed for their development. In order to secure the required supply of oil, either for current use or for storage, it was necessary for said railroad company to finance such development. This it did by advancing $60,000 to said oil companies. This sum was not advanced for the development of storage oil exclusively, nor for the development of current use oil alone, but it was advanced for the development of the production of both. It was paid for the purpose of facilitating such development, so as to insure a steady flow of current use oil as well as an accumulation of storage oil. The fact that it was agreed that said $60,000 should be applied as payment for storage oil is immaterial. It was advanced for the purpose of developing the oil properties of said oil companies, so that both oil for current use and storage oil might be produced. It is not reasonable to suppose that said railroad company would have advanced the sum of $60,000 without feeling assured that it was going to be furnished with current use oil during the five-year period covered by the contract, as well as with the storage oil. On the other hand, it is apparent that said oil companies would not have taken a contract to furnish current use oil alone at the price agreed upon without the privilege of also furnishing the additional 200,000 barrels of storage oil. Nor would they have entered into the second supplemental agreement to furnish the current use oil if said $60,000 had not been advanced. It will thus be seen that the obligations of the contract to furnish storage oil and current use oil cannot be separated. The contract provided that "all oil required to be used during said term (five years) by the buyer for all its purposes," etc., should be furnished. These reasons make it plain to us that the intention of the parties was to treat the contract as a whole, and that the payment of said sum of $60,000 was made and accepted by the parties accordingly.

We have then a case where the cause of action of the plaintiff on the assigned demands for the delivery of current use oil, and the right of the defendant to recoup on account of the $60,000 advanced to plaintiff's assignor for development purposes, grew out of and had their origin in the same subject-matter and in the same contract. Under such circumstances recoupment was proper. American Bridge Co. v. City of Boston, 202 Mass. 374, 88 N. E. 1089; Rockwell v. Daniels, 4 Wis. 432; Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Co., 13 Law Rep. App. Cas. 199; Salt Fork Coal Co. v. Eldridge Coal Co., 170 Ill. App. 268; Seibert v. Dunn, 216 N. Y. 237, 110 N. E. 447; 34 Cyc. pp. 623, 625, 643, 376, 695.

In respondent's brief numerous authorities are cited on this point. It is unnecessary to discuss them, however, more than to say that they are based upon the theory that the contracts under consideration in those cases were divisible, which, as we have seen, is not the case here.

[3, 4] The exact time when said oil companies breached their contract, whether it was prior or subsequent to the notice of assignment, can make no difference so far as the application of the doctrine of recoupment is concerned. If we were here dealing with the question of set-off instead of that of recoupment, a different rule would doubtless prevail. There is a marked difference between the two doctrines. The chief distinctions are that the former is a creation of statute, while the latter existed at common law, and that the former is applicable when there are different contracts, while the latter flows from the same contract as that which forms the foundation of plaintiff's claim. If the breach here occurred prior to the notice of assignment, there would be no question but that the assignee took the rights of the assignor subject to all equities, set-offs, and other defenses then existing. Section 368, Code Civ. Proc. A complete breach did not occur, however, until the last days of April or early in May, 1908, which was subsequent to the notice of assignment. In the contract it was provided that deliveries of storage oil should commence on April 1, 1908, and that the failure by the sellers to load cars for more than 10 consecutive days should not be considered a breach of said agreement, but that, in case of such failure to load the same, the party in default should be required to fully make up the deficiency within 20 days, which allowed said oil companies until the end of April before they were completely in default. During the last days of April or early in May, however, the representatives of the railroad company called personally on the representatives of the oil companies to ascertain what said oil companies intended to do about fulfilling their contract, at which time the representatives of the oil companies stated:

"We can't furnish the oil either in the quantity or quality stated in the contract, and we will have to quit—throw it up."

This constituted a complete breach of the contract, and it having occurred subsequent to the notice of assignment, and the action of the assignee having been commenced subsequent to such breach, the railroad company was given the right to recoup as against plaintiff's assignor to the extent of its claim arising because of such breach.

This rule of law is best illustrated by the case of American Bridge Co. of N. Y. et al. v. City of Boston, supra, wherein a contractor, on April 10, 1902, assigned certain payments due him to a bank, notice of which assignment was given on November 14, 1902. A few days subsequent to the notice of assignment the assignor abandoned the contract. Action was brought on the assignment in October, 1906. The defendant pleaded recoupment on account of the damage suffered by reason of the breach of the contract. It was held that, although the breach occurred subsequent to the notice of assignment, recoupment was a proper defense. The decision in that case is based upon the ground that the right of the defendant to claim damages for the nonperformance of the contract existed at the time of the making of the contract, at the time of assignment, and at the time of the notice of assignment, and that the assignees knew it, and they also knew it would become available to the defendant the moment the assignor should commit a breach. It is further stated in the opinion in that case that, even if the sums sued upon were due at the time of the notice of assignment, still, if the action was brought by the assignor after default, there could be no doubt that the defendant would have the right to recoup damages suffered by such default, the court saying:

"And the assignees who seek to enforce this claim can stand in no better position in this respect than the assignor. The defendant is simply trying to enforce a right existing under the contract at the time of the notice, a right of which the assignees had knowledge; and, since they have delayed suit for these sums until after default, the defendant may recoup against them as it could have recouped against the assignor."

Neither is the situation changed by the fact that the bank did not know of the existence of the second supplemental agreement at the time of said assignment. As assignee it took subject to all equities and defenses between the original parties to the agreement existing at the time of the assignment. Those rights were not confined to those parts of the contract known to the assignee, but they embraced the equities and defenses covered by the entire contract. Fleming v. Law, 163 Cal. 227, 124 Pac. 1018; San Jose Ranch Co. v. San Jose Land Co., 132 Cal. 582, 64 Pac. 1097; 5 Corp. Jur. 963, note 28.

[5] In view of the authorities above cited it is our opinion that appellant should not have been deprived of its right to recoup, unless it was estopped from doing so by its acts and conduct.

The facts upon which the doctrine of estoppel was applied against appellant have already been related in the first part of this opinion. In this respect it is contended by respondent that on April 8, 1908, when appellant was notified of the assignment to the bank, appellant should have notified the bank that it had a claim, or intended to make a claim, against said oil companies because of the payment of said sum of $60,000; that instead of doing so it sent the assignment back to the oil companies for corrections as to the form of the assignment, and with instructions as to how the assignment should be drawn in the future; that the bank thereafter, acting in pursuance of these instructions, presented future assignments to appellant, which appellant accepted, and on April 15 and 16, 1908, made payments to the bank for current use oil in the aggregate sum of $4,328.85. From these facts respondent argues that the bank was lulled into a state of financial security and encouraged to make the advances to said oil companies.

The weakness of respondent's whole contention is, however, that the bank did nothing and said nothing which would indicate to appellant that it had advanced or intended to advance to said oil companies any money on its shipments of oil. Appellant was in total ignorance of that fact. Respondent claims that that part of the oil companies' letter of April 8, 1908, wherein it was stated, "This order to remain in full force and effect until revoked by us with the consent of said Kern Valley Bank," was of itself sufficient notice that the rights of the bank were absolute. While the language quoted may have indicated in a vague fashion that the bank had some interest in said payments which could not be canceled without its consent, the letter does not carry the effect contended for by respondent. On the contrary the letter as a whole appears to be only a direction to make payments to said bank, without disclosing any interest which the bank may have had. It does not even state in positive terms that an assignment had been actually made, and there is nothing contained in the letter from which it can even be inferred that the bank was making advances to said oil companies on shipments of oil to appellant. If any assignment can be inferred from said letter at all, it could with more assurance be assumed therefrom that the assignment was made in satisfaction of or to apply upon a past indebtedness, or that it should apply upon some particular trust, or that the bank was acting as a depository for said oil companies merely for the purpose of receiving the funds. The fact that appellant did not assume the burden of fully informing said bank of the extent of its dealings with said oil companies does not create the barrier of an estoppel. It had the right to assume that the bank was fully informed as to the second supplemental agreement and of the payment of said sum of $60,000, when it is taken into consideration that one of the directors of said bank was the general manager of one of said oil companies and the president of the other during all of these transactions. Before respondent can successfully urge estoppel, it must be shown that respondent was not only destitute of knowledge of the real facts, but that it was without convenient or ready means of acquiring such knowledge. Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 Pac. 267; Huse v. Den, 85 Cal. 390, 24 Pac. 790, 20 Am. St. Rep. 232; 16 Cyc. 738.

[6, 7] No estoppel arises where a party setting it up is under as great obligation to inform the person sought to be estopped of the real facts as the latter is to inform himself. 16 Cyc. 741. It is plain to be seen that, had said bank made such inquiries as the law enjoined upon it to make prior to or at the time of said assignment, the present controversy would not have arisen. Nor does the fact of the payments by said railroad company to said bank on April 15 and 16, 1908, justify an estoppel. Those payments covered deliveries of current use oil made prior to April 1, 1908, which was eight days prior to the so-called notice of assignment. In order to constitute an estoppel it must be shown that there was an intentional and deliberate declaration, act, or omission on the part of the party sought to be estopped. There must be an intentional deceit or gross negligence shown (Lackmann v. Kearney, 142 Cal. 112, 75 Pac. 668), and if silence is relied upon to constitute the estoppel, such silence must be willful or culpable and result in another placing himself in an unfavorable position on the faith in or understanding of a fact which the person remaining silent can contradict (Elttinge v. Santos, 171 Cal. 278, 152 Pac. 915, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1143). But where there is no duty to speak mere silence will not create an equitable estoppel. Winans v. Sierra Lumber Co., 66 Cal. 61, 4 Pac. 952; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674.

Under the facts above related, and in view of the authorities cited, it is our opinion that the doctrine of equitable estoppel does not apply.

Judgment reversed.

PEOPLE v. BICKERSTAFF. (Cr. 493.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 3, 1920. Opinion of Supreme Court, In Bank, Denying Hearing June 2, 1920.)

1. Intoxicating liquors §134—Sale of beer containing less than 1 per cent. alcohol no crime.

Sale of beer containing less than 1 per cent. of alcohol was not prohibited by the Wyllie Act.

2. Criminal law §789(3)—Instruction as to reasonable doubt of alcoholic content erroneously refused.

In a prosecution under the Wyllie Act, court erred in refusing to instruct, "If you have any reasonable doubt as to whether the beverage sold was alcoholic within the meaning of the Wyllie Act, you will return a verdict of not guilty," and "in determining the quantity of alcohol therein you are to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt, if any you have. You are to consider and weigh carefully all of the evidence in the case; and, if you cannot say that you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that said beverage contained 1 per cent. or more, by volume, of alcohol, you will find the defendant not guilty."

3. Intoxicating liquors §131—Lack of knowledge of volume of alcohol in beer no defense under Wyllie Act.

It is no defense in a prosecution under the Wyllie Act for selling beer containing 1 per cent. or more of alcohol, that defendant did not know the liquor sold by him contained the prohibited amount of alcohol.

4. Criminal law §330, 561(1)—Burden on state to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt.

A defendant in a criminal case is never required or expected to prove his innocence, but the burden is on the prosecution to prove the defendant guilty of the crime with which he is charged, and to prove every fact essential to constitute that crime beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty; and, if the jury cannot say, after a careful consideration of all of the evidence in the case, that the guilt of the defendant has thereby been established beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, it is its sworn duty to acquit the defendant.

5. Criminal law §834(5)—Requested instruction as to embodying rule as to reasonable doubt should have been given without modification.

Where defendant requested the court to instruct: "That under the law no jury should, nor has the right to, convict the defendant of a crime upon mere suspicion, however strong (nor simply because there may be a preponderance of all of the evidence in the case against him), nor merely because there is or may be strong reason to suspect that he is guilty (but before a jury can lawfully convict they must be convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond all reasonable doubt)"—court erred in modifying the instructions by striking out the words inclosed in parentheses.

6. Criminal law §834(5)—Requested instruction embodying rule as to reasonable doubt should have been given without modification.

Where accused requested court to instruct: "That mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant a conviction (nor is it sufficient that a greater weight of evidence supports the allegation of the information, if it does), nor is it sufficient upon the doctrine of chances that it is more probable that the defendant is guilty. (To warrant a conviction of the defendant he must be proven to be guilty clearly and conclusively beyond all reasonable doubt, so that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all of the case is considered together)"—court erred in modifying the instruction by striking out the words included in parentheses.

7. Criminal law §782(1)—Defendant entitled to instructions as to conditions of evidence requiring acquittal.

Accused is entitled to instructions telling the jury in clear language the conditions of the evidence that would make it their duty to acquit.

On Consideration in Supreme Court of Petition for Hearing.

8. Criminal law §806(3)—Court should not repeat instructions.

Trial judge should take care to give to the jury once and in clear language every principle of law applicable to the particular case; and, when he has done this he is not required to repeat any of them, no matter how many separate instructions are asked which may include them, and such is true with regard to instructions relating to the presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and the degree of proof required of the prosecution.

9. Criminal law §789(9)—Instruction on reasonable doubt not erroneous.

An instruction that reasonable doubt "is not a mere imaginary, captious, or possible doubt, but a fair doubt, based upon the testimony, reason, and common sense, and which leaves the mind in such a state that you cannot say that you feel fully and entirely satisfied of the defendant's guilt. In other words, it is that state of mind, after an entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say that they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge, a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are to act conscientiously upon it"—although not as full and clear as the instruction usually given, was not erroneous.

10. Criminal law §789(2)—Courts should adhere to precedents in framing instructions on reasonable doubt.

Trial judges should adhere to the well-established precedents in framing or approving instructions on the subject of reasonable doubt, and should avoid any attempt to frame new definitions of the term.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

J. A. Bickerstaff was convicted of selling alcoholic liquor in no-license territory and appeals. Reversed in District Court of Appeals and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

P. H. Ryan, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ELLISON, Presiding Judge pro tem. An information was filed against the defendant in the superior court of the county of Humboldt, state of California, wherein he was accused of the crime of selling alcoholic liquors in no-license territory, the particular allegation being "that heretofore, to wit, on the 29th day of July, A. D. 1919, the said J. A. Bickerstaff within the boundary of said 'no-license' territory, in supervisorial district No. 2, at and in the county of Humboldt, state of California, did willfully, knowingly, and unlawfully sell, furnish, distribute and give away alcoholic liquors, to wit, beer and which was not so mixed with other drugs as to prevent its use as a beverage, to one William McKay." After trial had the defendant was convicted, and from the judgment pronounced upon the verdict he prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant calls attention to many matters occurring during the trial which he claims were error and prejudicial to his rights. We deem it not necessary to state all of them, and in deciding the case shall only discuss those that seem to be of the most importance.

The prosecution was had under the so-called Wyllie Act (St. 1911, p. 599). In construing said act the court determined that it prohibited the sale of beer regardless of the amount of alcohol contained in it, and regardless of whether it contained any alcohol at all, or not. Thus, in one instruction the jury were informed:

"I charge you that if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time and place set forth in the information, the defendant did sell, furnish, or give to William McKay beer or any other malt liquor, then I instruct you that it is not necessary that you should find that said beer or other malt liquor contained 1 per cent. or more, by volume of alcohol or that you should find that it contained any alcohol at all, but it is enough if you find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did at the time and place set forth in the information sell, furnish, or give to said William McKay beer or malt liquor to warrant you in bringing in a verdict of guilty."

The jury were given other instructions along the same lines. This was manifestly error, and in direct contradiction to the decisions of the higher courts of this state heretofore rendered.

The case of People v. Strickler, 25 Cal. App. 60, 142 Pac. 1121, involved the construction of the meaning of this particular part of the Wyllie Local Option Law. In fact, it is known that the district attorney of Colusa county purposely framed his information in that case for the purpose of getting a direct decision of the higher courts as to whether the selling of beer of less than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol was a crime or not, and in filing his information, in order that the matter might be squarely presented to the courts uninfluenced by any and all other considerations, he inserted in his information that the liquors sold by the defendant in that case were malt liquors containing less than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol. And it was his argument in that case that the statute made the selling of malt liquors, regardless of the amount of alcohol contained in them, a crime, and that the words "any other liquor or mixture * * * which contains one per cent. by volume, or more, of alcohol" were not intended to and did not qualify the previous words, "spirituous, vinous and malt liquors." In deciding the case against the contention of the district attorney, the court used, among other expressions, the following:

"In the case of People v. Mueller, No. 231 (18 Cal. App. Dec., p. 220), this court was called upon to consider the propositions above stated, and we there expressed the opinion that, while in charging the offense of selling or keeping for sale spirituous, vinous or malt liquors, it was not necessary to allege that such liquors contained the amount of alcohol specified in section 21, a conviction could not be sustained under such an indictment unless such liquors were shown to be intoxicating. This conclusion was reached mainly from the proposition, declared in the opinion in said case, that the terms 'spirituous,' 'vinous,' and 'malt,' as generically designating certain kinds of liquors, must have been used by the Legislature in their popular sense—that is to say, that they were used to describe, generically, those alcoholic liquors commonly known as 'spirituous,' 'vinous,' and 'malt,' and which, it is known, will produce intoxication. * * * We are still of the opinion, however, that the Legislature did not intend to make it unlawful for one to engage in the business of selling nonintoxicating liquors. In other words, it is not reasonable to suppose that it was the legislative intent to contraband the traffic in spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors possessing no intoxicating quality. To the contrary, it seems very clear, when we consider the ultimate object of the Local Option Law, that the Legislature thus aimed the shafts of its denunciation solely against any liquors the use of which would produce intoxication, and that, by specifying the quantity of alcohol which, when used in liquors, would bring them within the condemnation of the statute, it intended to and did establish a test applicable to all liquors the sale of which was designed by the statute to be prohibited in any territory to which the law might appropriately be made applicable. This conclusion is arrived at by a view of section 21 of the act by the light of the rule of construction, ejusdem generis, above referred to. In its practical application, this rule simply means that 'general and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning, being associated together, take color from each other, so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general.' * * * Or, as this maxim was stated by Lord Tenterden * * * : 'Where a statute or other document enumerates several classes or persons of things, and immediately following and classed with such enumeration the clause embraces "other" persons or things, the word "other" will generally be read as "other such like," so that persons or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis with, and not of a quality superior to or different from, those specifically enumerated.' This rule of construction is by no means of universal application, and its use is to carry out, not to defeat, the legislative intent. It must yield to another salutary rule of construction, viz. that every part of a statute should, if possible, be upheld and given its appropriate force. * * * But, in this case, since it is plainly manifest, as stated, that the purpose of the Local Option Law is to suppress drunkenness and consequently the traffic in intoxicating liquors in those subdivisions where its operation is properly and legally invoked, the rule of ejusdem generis may be applied to the construction of section 21 without doing violence to or rendering inoperative any part of said section or of the law. Indeed, a construction of section 21 by the light of that doctrine will manifestly lead to the upholding of all the provisions of the law agreeably to the evident legislative design at the bottom of its enactment."

After decision by the appellate court in this case, a petition to have the case heard in the Supreme Court was denied. In denying it the Supreme Court necessarily approved of the disposition made of the case by the appellate court, because, as stated, the case presented no question for the consideration of either court other than the construction of this particular section of the Wyllie Local Option Law.

[1, 2] The giving of the instruction by the court, telling the jury that the amount of alcohol contained in the beer alleged to have been sold was entirely immaterial was error which necessitates a reversal of the judgment. On this feature of the case the defendant presented certain instructions, and asked that they be given to the jury, but the request was refused. Said instructions were in harmony with the decisions of the courts of this state, and should have been given. Among them was the instruction numbered 17, which reads as follows:

"If you have any reasonable doubt as to whether the beverage sold was alcoholic within the meaning of the Wyllie Act you will return a verdict of not guilty, and in this connection I charge you that alcoholic liquor as used in the Wyllie Act means liquor which contains 1 per cent. by volume, or more, of alcohol, and which is not so mixed with other drugs as to prevent its use as a beverage."

Also instruction 18, which reads as follows:

"I charge you that if the beverage which defendant sold to McKay contained less than the 1 per cent. by volume, of alcohol, it was not unlawful to sell the same, and in determining the quantity of alcohol therein you are to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt, if any you have. You are to consider and weigh carefully all of the evidence in the case, and if you cannot say that you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty that said beverage contained 1 per cent. or more, by volume, of alcohol, you will find the defendant not guilty."

These instructions contained a clear and accurate statement of the law and of the rights of the defendant, and it is beyond controversy that he was entitled to have them read to the jury upon the trial of his case.

As the case may be tried again, some other matters are presented that should be considered. It was the claim of the defendant that at the time he sold the beer he honestly believed and had a right to believe, that it contained less than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, and asked that the case be submitted to the jury upon that theory, and asked for a direct instruction to the jury that, if they believed that the defendant acted in good faith in selling the beer and in the belief that it contained less than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, he should be acquitted. The court refused to give this instruction, and its action is assigned as error.

In the case of People v. Pera, 36 Cal. App. 292, 171 Pac. 1091, a similar question was raised, and it was decided against the contention of the appellant therein. In that case it was said:

"It is complained that the court erred, and thus seriously prejudiced the rights of the accused by instructing the jury that it was not necessary to the consummation of a crime of the character of the one with which the defendant is here charged that there should exist and be shown an intent to commit the act, and that, therefore, all that the jury were required to find, to reach a verdict of guilty, was that the defendant kept a place of public resort for the purpose of selling and distributing alcoholic liquors within no-license territory—that the specific intent with which the act was done was immaterial. We think the rule as declared by the instruction is correct, in so far as it relates to a case of this character. The decisions appear to be quite uniform upon the proposition that where, in invoking and applying the police power, the Legislature has prohibited certain acts and denounced them as criminal, the mere commission of such acts, regardless of the intent with which they were committed, is sufficient to constitute the crime so denounced. There are, perhaps, certain exceptions to this rule, as, for instance, where the statute itself uses language in describing or defining the crime indicating that scienter or a specific intent to do the act was essential to constitute it a crime. But particularly in cases interdicting the traffic in intoxicating liquors the rule generally is that the mere commission of the act is sufficient to consummate the offense, and in the present case the law authorizing the establishment of 'no-license territories' uses no language indicating an intention in the Legislature to make the intent with which the act of keeping a resort for the purpose of selling intoxicating liquors is committed an ingredient of the offense. In Commonwealth v. Holstein, 132 Pa. St. 357 (19 Atl. 273), the court, having before it a case in which the defendant had been convicted of the unlawful sale of alcoholic liquor, said: 'It is not necessary to sustain a conviction for selling intoxicating liquors under the act of 1887 for the commonwealth to prove a criminal intent. It is enough to show the sale, when the defendant may, if he can, shield himself behind a license. If the sale is contrary to law, the intent has nothing to do with it. A contrary ruling would fritter away the act of 1887, and conviction under it would be rare.'"

And in the case of People v. Allen, reported in 37 Cal. App. at page 180, 174 Pac. at page 374, the case of People v. Pera, 36 Cal. App. 292, 171 Pac. 1091, is referred to and approved, and it is added:

"Section 13 of the act of April 4, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 599), provides as follows: 'It shall be unlawful for any person * * * within the boundaries of any no-license territory to sell, furnish, distribute or give away any alcoholic liquors except as provided in section 16 hereof.' (Nothing in said section 16 has reference to the facts in this case.) Plainly the rule applies in cases arising under this section, as it did in People v. Pera, which arose under the same statute though for a different offense."

[3] Under those decisions it must be held that it is the law in this state that the selling of alcoholic liquors containing 1 per cent. or more by volume of alcohol in no-license territory is forbidden, and that it is not a defense for the defendant to prove that he did not know the liquor sold by him contained the prohibited amount of alcohol.

We think the court erred in not giving some of the instructions asked by the defendant's counsel and in giving other instructions than those above referred to.

Upon the question of reasonable doubt the court instructed the jury as follows:

"As the term 'reasonable doubt' is used a number of times in the instructions given, you will bear in mind that it is always used in the same sense. It is not a mere imaginary, capitious, or possible doubt, but a fair doubt, based upon the testimony, reason, and common sense, and which leaves the mind in such a state that you cannot say that you feel fully and entirely satisfied of the defendant's guilt. In other words, it is that state of mind, after an entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say that they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge, a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding and satisfies the reason and judgment of those who are to act conscientiously upon it."

An instruction, telling the jury that a fair doubt can be based upon reason and common sense, has been repeatedly condemned by the Supreme Court of this state. The latter part of the instruction is in approved language, but the first part weakens its force and effect.

In People v. Paulsell, 115 Cal. at page 12, 46 Pac. at page 734, it is said:

"If experimental departures from the well-established language sanctioned by all courts upon the subject of reasonable doubt are to be here allowed, and each trial court is to venture upon unusual language to express the idea contained in language so often approved, we will be afloat upon a new and unknown sea, and complications will arise in every criminal case coming here which will be very difficult to unravel. In the present case, it is sufficient to say that the court introduced the new and unused phrase 'common sense,' and told the jury that the doubt must be based upon that. Counsel for appellant argues—after giving some of the definitions of common sense to be found in the dictionaries—that this language is merely the equivalent of saying that a jury should convict if they are satisfied of the guilt of the defendant to such a certainty as would influence their minds in the important affairs of life, which was held to be unsound by this court in People v. Brannon, 47 Cal. 96; People v. Ah Sing, 51 Cal. 372, and People v. Bemmerly, 87 Cal. 121. It is sufficient to say, however, that the phrase 'common sense' is about as uncertain as any phrase in the language. When one speaks of common sense, he generally means his own common sense; and there is no warrant for the unnecessary use of such a term when there is apt language to express the idea of reasonable doubt which has been frequently approved and pointed out as the language proper to be used. For this reason the judgment must be reversed."

We hold that it was error to give the instruction as to reasonable doubt, modified by the expression that it must be based upon reason and common sense.

In the same connection, attention is called to the very plain and explicit instruction asked by the defendant, numbered 6, and which was refused by the court. It reads as follows:

"By reasonable doubt is meant that state of the case which, after an entire comparison and consideration of all of the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say that they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the guilt of the defendant."

This was a clear statement of the law, and should have been given as requested.

[4] We think also defendant's instruction numbered 5 should have been given. It reads as follows:

"A defendant in a criminal case is never required or expected to prove his innocence, but the burden is on the prosecution to prove the defendant guilty of the crime with which he is charged, and to prove every fact essential to constitute that crime, beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty; and, if the jury cannot say, after a careful consideration of all of the evidence in this case, that the guilt of the defendant has thereby been established beyond all reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, it is their sworn duty to acquit the defendant."

We find in the instructions of the court which were given no explicit, clear statement of the defendant's rights as embodied in this proposed instruction.

[5] Also, instruction 8, asked by the defendant, should have been given. It reads as follows:

"The court instructs you that under the law no jury should, nor has it the right to, convict the defendant of a crime upon mere suspicion, however strong (nor simply because there may be a preponderance of all of the evidence in the case against him), nor merely because there is or may be strong reason to suspect that he is guilty (but before a jury can lawfully convict they must be convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond all reasonable doubt)."

The court modified the above instruction by striking out the words inclosed in parentheses, and, as thus modified, gave it to the jury. We think the defendant was entitled to have the instruction read to the jury as presented. It contained an accurate statement of the law and his rights, and he was entitled to have it presented to the jury.

[6] The defendant asked for instruction No. 12, which reads as follows:

"I further instruct you that mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant a conviction (nor is it sufficient that a greater weight of evidence supports the allegations of the information, if it does), nor is it sufficient upon the doctrine of chances that it is more probable that the defendant is guilty. (To warrant a conviction of the defendant he must be proven to be guilty clearly and conclusively beyond all reasonable doubt, so that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all of the case is considered together.)"

The court struck out all of said instructions embraced within the parentheses, and, as thus modified, gave it to the jury. As asked, it contained a correct statement of the law, and the defendant was entitled to have it given to the jury.

[7] We are of the opinion that the law, as stated in these requested instructions was not covered by the instructions given. The defendant was entitled to instructions telling the jury in clear language the conditions of the evidence that would make it their duty to acquit him.

Some other matters are referred to by defendant's counsel as having occurred at the trial, especially in the impanelment of the jury, which he claims were prejudicial to the defendant's rights, but, as it is not probable that the same incidents will be repeated upon the second trial, we deem it unnecessary in disposing of the case to enter into a discussion as to what effect, if any, such incidents had upon his rights.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank,
Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [8] The petition for a rehearing is denied. We think it necessary to say, however, that we do not approve of all that is said in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal on the subject of the instructions given and refused. The opinion appears to approve the pernicious practice, sometimes indulged in by the trial courts, of repeating over and over again instructions couched in varying language, but embodying the same principle of law. This is especially prevalent with regard to instructions relating to the presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and the degree of proof required of the prosecution. Repetitions of this character are not necessary, and should be avoided as far as possible. Several of the instructions criticized in this case were given, in effect, in other instructions, using somewhat different forms of expression, but having the same meaning. The trial judge should take care to give to the jury, once and in clear language, every principle of law applicable to the particular case. When he has done this, he is not required to repeat any of them, no matter how many separate instructions are asked which may include them. Such continual repetition tends to give undue emphasis to the particular point to which they may relate, and operates to confuse the jury in their consideration of the evidence.

[9, 10] The instruction defining reasonable doubt, criticized in People v. Paulsell, 115 Cal. 12, 46 Pac. 734, was approved in People v. White, 116 Cal. 17, 47 Pac. 771, and in People v. Shaughnessy, 110 Cal. 604, 43 Pac. 2. The instruction given on that subject in the present case is not substantially different from that under consideration in the three cases just cited, and we think it should not be considered erroneous, although it is not as full and possibly not as clear as the instruction usually given. We fully approve what is said in the Paulsell Case, to the effect that trial judges should adhere to the well-established precedents in framing or approving instructions on the subject of reasonable doubt, and should avoid any attempt to frame new definitions of the term.

PEOPLE v. T. WAH HING. (Cr. 503.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 1, 1920.)

1. Statutes § 114(4)—Title of state Medical Practice Act held sufficiently comprehensive to include punishment for practicing without a certificate.

Title of state Medical Practice Act, reading "An act to regulate the examination of applicants for license, and the practice of those licensed to treat diseases, * * * to establish a board of medical examiners * * * and to repeal an act entitled 'An act for the regulation of practice of medicine,' " etc., held sufficiently comprehensive to include provisions as to punishment of a person holding himself out as entitled to practice medicine without a certificate under section 17, and therefore not violative of Const. art. 4, § 24.

2. Physicians and surgeons § 6(9)—Information charging practice of medicine without a certificate held sufficient.

Information charging that defendant "did then and there willfully and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted * * * without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate from the state medical examiners of the state of California" held sufficient in prosecution for violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, as against contention that it did not give the name of any patient or disease treated or the mode or system of treatment practiced.

3. Physicians and surgeons § 6(10)—Evidence held to sustain conviction for practicing without a certificate.

In prosecution for practicing medicine without a certificate in violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, evidence held to sustain conviction.

4. Physicians and surgeons § 6(10)—Burden of proving possession of certificate entitling him to practice medicine is on defendant.

In prosecution for practicing medicine without a certificate in violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, the state by proving that defendant practiced medicine established a prima facie case shifting the burden on defendant of proving that he had the necessary certificate; such fact being within defendant's knowledge.

5. Criminal law § 789(17) — Instruction on reasonable doubt held not erroneous.

Instruction: "The term 'reasonable doubt' as applied to the evidence in criminal cases means an actual and substantial doubt arising from the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence in the case. It does not mean a doubt which may arise from some mere whim or vagary or from any groundless surmise or guess"—held not erroneous.

6. Criminal law § 90(3)—Police court of Sacramento held not to have jurisdiction of prosecution for violation of state Medical Practice Act.

Charter of City of Sacramento, § 164, subd. 1, giving police court of such city jurisdiction "of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws or by ordinances of the city and of all other crimes cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace and police courts under the Constitution and laws of the state of California," did not give such police court jurisdiction over prosecution for violation of the state Medical Practice Act, since the charter provision merely confers on such court, as to misdemeanors committed within the limits of the city under the general laws of the state, concurrent jurisdiction with justices' court of Sacramento county, and does not confer jurisdiction where the maximum penalty is by fine exceeding $500 or imprisonment exceeding six months; such charter provision neither superseding nor conflicting with Pen. Code, § 1425, as to jurisdiction of justices' courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

T. Wah Hing was convicted of practicing medicine without a certificate, and from judgment of conviction and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

T. H. Christiansen, Robert B. McMillan, S. Luke Howe, C. E. McLaughlin, and C. P. McLaughlin, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. Defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Sacramento county with a violation of section 17 of the state Medical Practice Act, approved June 2, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 722). The information alleges that:

"The said T. Wah Hing on the — day of August, 1919, at the county of Sacramento, in the said state of California, and before the filing of this information, did then and there willfully and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in the state of California, without having at the time of so doing a valid unrevoked certificate from the state board of medical examiners of the state of California."

The defendant was tried and convicted and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The defendant attacks the constitutionality of the law on the ground that the title of the act is not sufficiently comprehensive to include the matters contained in said section 17. A similar objection was raised to the title of this act in People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 Pac. 451, and was decided adversely to appellant's contention. In that case it was contended that the title of the Medical Practice Act violated the provisions of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, in that the title was not sufficiently expressive of its contents. The court, in passing upon this contention, said:

"It is first contended that the title of the act is not sufficiently expressive of its contents, and that section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution is violated thereby. Analyzed further, the contention is that the title of the act does not suggest a purpose of the Legislature to regulate the business or practice of those who engage in healing or treating the sick or deformed, but to regulate only the matter of the examination of those who chose to apply for certificates, which documents are to merely certify that the holders thereof have been duly examined and licensed. This contention, if it were conceded to be well founded, would result in a construction to be given to the act which would permit all persons whomsoever to practice medicine, or any mode or system of healing, without being licensed, and would make the matter of procuring a license or certificate merely optional. Admittedly the body of the act is broad and comprehensive enough to regulate the practice of all persons who shall engage in the business of treating the sick or deformed. * * * A liberal rule of construction has been adopted, however, in the interest of protecting meritorious legislation from being declared void through inartificially constructed titles. The main object of this provision is to prevent legislators and the public from being intrapped by misleading titles to bills whereby legislation relating to one subject might be obtained under the title of another. * * * It seems to be well settled that it is not necessary that the title of an act should embrace an abstract or catalogue of its contents.' Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226 (24 Pac. 383). * * * To our minds, by the title of the act here being considered, wherein it set forth the purpose to regulate the examination of applicants for license to treat the sick or deformed, there is suggested at once that the state has proposed to require examinations to be made and licenses to be issued to persons who shall engage in that business. The prohibition that persons not so licensed shall be denied the right to practice seems pertinent and germane to the subject expressed in the title. Several of the illustrative cases given in Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633 (29 Pac. 261), are directly in point.

"Our conclusion on this branch of the case is that the objection as stated in the briefs that the title of the act is not sufficient in its expression of the purposes declared in the body of the act itself is without merit."

[2] The defendant claims that the information is insufficient in that it "does not conform to the sections of the Penal Code (sections 950, 952) requiring clearness and certainty in charging crime"; that it does not give the name of any patient, or disease treated, the mode or system of treatment practiced, but "charges that defendant practiced, attempted to practice, and held himself out as practicing a mode or system of healing the sick and afflicted."

The information in this case is substantially the same as the information that was before the Supreme Court in People v. Ratledge, 172 Cal. 401, 156 Pac. 455, and which the court held sufficiently charged a violation of section 17 of the said Medical Practice Act. The court said:

"The information is attacked upon the ground that it charges 'the crime of practicing medicine without a certificate from the medical board,' the contention being that no such crime is denounced by the law. It is true that the statute does not contain the quoted words, but clearly they are used merely for purposes of general description of the offense as they are followed by the averment that the crime was 'committed as follows: That the said T. F. Ratledge on the 30th day of October, 1914, at, and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully practice, attempt to practice, and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted in the state of California, without then and there having a valid, unrevoked certificate authorizing him to practice a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted in this state from the board of medical examiners of the state of California.' This sufficiently charges a violation of section 17 of the Medical Practice Act (Stats. 1913, p. 734), and is not open to the criticism that it seeks to impute many offenses to defendant because any one of the acts or omissions averred and conjunctively pleaded would suffice as the basis of an information. [Citing cases.] This information does not fall within the rule declared in People v. Plath, 166 Cal. 227 (135 Pac. 964)."

It is argued on behalf of appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. It appears from the record that on the 13th day of August, 1919, one Mrs. Francis Sweeney, who was then employed by the state board of medical examiners, called at the office of the defendant in Sacramento and asked him if he was Dr. T. Wah Hing, to which defendant replied that he was. She told him that she was afflicted with nervousness and not able to sleep. He felt her pulse, said he would give her some medicine to cure her, and gave her a package of herbs, giving directions as to their use and charged her $3.50, which she paid. She then left his office and returned shortly after with one Edward P. Morse, then a special agent of the state board of medical examiners. The defendant stated to said Morse that he had treated Mrs. Sweeney for nervousness and prescribed medicine for her and had charged her $3.50. He told Morse that he was a regular practicing physician, and had been for 20 years in Sacramento; that he treated any kind of a case; that he gave internal and external remedies. He took Morse to his drug store in the rear of this office, where there was a large assortment of herbs and drugs. He also exhibited to Morse a record of his patients showing various names and dates, and amounts against those names. There was also introduced in evidence a card which reads:

"Telephone Main 725. Dr. T. Wah Hing, Chinese Physician and Surgeon, also Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat. Office 725 J Street, Sacramento, Cal. Office Hours, 9 to 11 a. m., 1 to 3, 7 to 9 p. m."

This card was handed to Mr. Morse by the defendant.

[3] This evidence is ample and sufficient to sustain the conviction of the defendant, and in addition to the foregoing there was other and additional evidence which tends strongly to support the verdict.

The defendant claims that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that no proof was offered showing that the defendant did not, at the time charged in the information have a valid, unrevoked certificate from the state board of medical examiners. A similar question was before the Supreme Court in People v. Boo Doo Hong, 122 Cal. 606, 55 Pac. 402. In that case the defendant was charged by information with the crime of willfully and unlawfully practicing medicine without having first procured a certificate to so practice as required by law. At the trial uncontradicted evidence was introduced showing that defendant had been practicing medicine, but no evidence was introduced on either side showing, or tending to show, that defendant had not a certificate to so practice as required by law. The court instructed the jury, in effect, that the burden was upon the defendant to establish that he had a certificate to practice medicine as provided by law, and if he failed to prove that he had such certificate, then it must be taken as true that he had not procured a certificate to so practice medicine.

[4] The court, in sustaining this instruction, among other things, said:

"Mr. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence, vol. 1, § 79, under the heading 'Negative Allegations,' says: 'But when the subject-matter of a negative averment lies peculiarly within the knowledge of the other party, the averment is taken as true unless disproved by that party. Such is the case in civil or criminal prosecutions for a penalty for doing an act which the statutes do not permit to be done by any persons, except those who are duly licensed therefor; as, for selling liquors, exercising a trade or profession, and the like. Here the party, if licensed, can immediately show it without the least inconvenience; whereas, if proof of the negative were required, the inconvenience would be very great.' * * *

"In 1 Jones' Law of Evidence, § 179, under the heading 'Burden as to Particular Facts Lying Peculiarly Within Knowledge of a Party,' is said: 'This is often illustrated in prosecutions for selling liquors or doing other acts without the license required by law. By a few authorities the rule is prescribed that in such cases the prosecution must offer some slight proof of the fact that no license has been granted, for example, by producing the book in which licenses are recorded; and, if the book fails to show that a license has been granted, the burden is shifted upon the defendant to prove the fact claimed by him; but the greater number of authorities hold that where a license would be a complete defense the burden is upon the defendant to prove the fact so clearly within his own knowledge.' * * *

"We think the rule upon this subject generally recognized and followed the correct one, and therefore conclude that the court did not err in giving the instruction complained of, and that the verdict was justified by the evidence."

[5] Complaint is made that the court erred in its instructions upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt. After fully instructing the jury on this subject in the oft-approved language of Chief Justice Shaw, the court gave the following instruction, which the defendant claims is error:

"The term reasonable doubt as applied to the evidence in criminal cases means an actual and substantial doubt arising from the unsatisfactory nature of the evidence of the case. It does not mean a doubt which may arise from some mere whim or vagary or from any groundless surmise or guess."

A similar instruction to this was held by this court not to be erroneous in the case of people v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 100 Pac. 887, and the court there said "that, rightly understood, the instruction is in reality within the definition of the doctrine of reasonable doubt as given by Chief Justice Shaw."

Other objections are based upon the modification and the refusal of certain instructions. We have examined these objections, and, without entering upon a discussion of them in detail, we think it is sufficient to say that they are without merit. The jury was very fully and fairly instructed by the court.

Finally, the appellant claims that under the charter of the city of Sacramento, ratified by the Legislature in 1911 (Stats. 1911, Extra Session, p. 305), the police court of said city has jurisdiction over all misdemeanors, no matter what may be the amount of the fine or the length of imprisonment. This contention of appellant is based on the first subdivision of section 164 of the said charter, which provides as follows:

"Said police court shall have jurisdiction: (1) Of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws or by ordinances of the city and of all other crimes cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace and police courts under the Constitution and laws of the state of California."

[6] We cannot agree with appellant in this contention. It is nowhere provided in said charter that the police court of the city of Sacramento shall have jurisdiction of misdemeanors where the maximum penalty is by fine exceeding $500, or imprisonment exceeding six months.

This court held in the Matter of the Application of Yee Kim Mah, 31 Cal. App. 196, 159 Pac. 1060, that—

The provisions of said charter creating a police court in the city of Sacramento did not

"confer upon the court so established exclusive jurisdiction of all simple misdemeanors committed within the limits of the city. The word 'exclusive' is nowhere used in those provisions. It is obvious to our minds that the most that was intended by those provisions of the charter, so far as are concerned misdemeanors committed under the general laws of the state, is that the police court of said city shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the justices' courts of the county of such misdemeanors when they are committed within the limits of said city."

It is obvious from the foregoing that the jurisdiction of the said police court as to misdemeanors committed under the general laws of the state is the same as the justices' courts of Sacramento county. There is no provision of said charter that supersedes or that is in conflict with or repugnant to any of the provisions of sections 1425 of the Penal Code.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a money judgment against him. The following facts appear without dispute: The defendant and two men by the name of Pike were stockholders and officers of a corporation known as the Pike Woolen Company, and the defendant and one of the Pikes executed to the plaintiffs a joint guaranty of any indebtedness that the woolen company might incur to them. The woolen company did incur such an indebtedness in the sum of $4,436.81. Thereafter the woolen company became embarrassed financially, and for the purpose of arranging its indebtedness executed two notes, one for $6,000 and one for $7,000, in favor of a representative of its creditors, including the plaintiffs. These notes represented the aggregate of the debts due the creditors, including the debt to the plaintiffs. The note for $6,000 was signed by the defendant's guarantor, Pike, and his wife, as well as by the company, and, as security for its payment, Pike and his wife also executed a deed of trust of certain property of their own. The court finds, and we may assume that the finding is justified by the evidence, that the defendant consented to the plaintiffs taking these notes. Payments were made on the notes from time to time, but finally the woolen company defaulted upon them, and the payee of the notes, the representative of the creditors, threatened to sell the property of the Pikes covered by the trust deed. Thereupon the Pikes, or one or the other of them, arranged with the payee of the notes for their purchase or return upon the payment of $5,000.

The defendant claims that the arrangement was for the purchase of the notes, and the plaintiffs claim that it was for the return of the notes to the woolen company. But, whatever may have been the negotiation between the Pikes and the payee, the thing that was finally done was that, in consideration of $5,000 paid him, the payee of the notes indorsed them to one of the Pikes. The uncontradicted testimony also is that the notes remained outstanding as obligations of the woolen company, and that the $5,000 which was paid for the notes was obtained by Pike from a third person by a second hypothecation of his property. The $5,000 was distributed by the payee of the notes among the

1. Payment ⚡16(1)—Note taken for open account does not discharge original debt.

Where notes are taken in the ordinary course for what have previously been open accounts, the indebtedness for which they are taken is not paid, in the sense that it is absolutely discharged; and if default be made upon the notes, an action can be maintained on the original indebtedness, as if the notes had never been given.

2. Assignments ⚡79—Transfer of note for indebtedness on open accounts transfers the original debt.

The transfer of notes taken in ordinary course for what have previously been open accounts transfers the original debt, precluding original creditor from thereafter maintaining an action thereon.

3. Guaranty ⚡53(2)—Creditor could not recover against guarantor after transfer of note.

Where note evidencing debt on open account was transferred, the original creditor could not recover on the original debt as against the debtor's guarantor.

creditors whom he represented, in proportion to their claims. Including their share of this, the plaintiffs received on account of their claim against the woolen company a total of $2,174.03, leaving a balance of $2,262.78, on which they received nothing.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs brought the present action against the defendant; the complaint containing two counts, one on the joint guaranty of the defendant and Pike for the recovery of the unpaid balance mentioned, and the other on the defendant's liability for his proportion of that balance as a stockholder of the woolen company. The answer of the defendant pleaded payment of the obligation of the woolen company to the plaintiffs, and also set out as a separate defense the facts stated above with reference to the giving of the two notes, and their subsequent transfer to Pike. The trial court found that the original indebtedness of the woolen company to the plaintiffs had not been paid, and also, in effect, that the facts alleged as a separate defense were not true. This latter finding must have been an inadvertence, for the facts stated appear without conflict, and for the most part in the testimony for the plaintiffs, as well as in that for the defendant. This finding must therefore be considered as not sustained by the evidence. The trial court concluded that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on both counts, and gave judgment to that effect.

It would seem to be quite evident that the plaintiffs cannot recover against the defendant as the guarantor of a debt of the woolen company, or as a stockholder of the company proportionately liable for its debt, if the plaintiffs had, before the commencement of their action, parted with the debt which is the basis of the action. The real question in the case is: Had they so parted?

[1] No question is made but that the original debt of the woolen company to the plaintiffs was covered into the two notes given the representative of the creditors. There is question made as to whether the two notes were taken in payment. The question, however, would seem to be one largely as to the use of terms, since the fact is clear that the notes were simply taken in ordinary course for what had previously been open accounts. It is well established that in such a case the indebtedness for which the notes are taken is not paid in the sense that it is absolutely discharged. If default be made upon the notes, an action can be maintained upon the original indebtedness, as if the notes had never been given.

[2] But, on the other hand, the notes evidence the debt, and if they are transferred the debt is transferred with them, and the original creditor can thereafter maintain no action upon it. It no longer belongs to him.

That the original debt for which a note has been taken passes with the transfer of the note was directly decided in Goldman v. Murray, 164 Cal. 419, 129 Pac. 462. There the plaintiff brought an action to recover from the defendant as a stockholder of a certain corporation his proportion of a certain indebtedness of the corporation. It appeared that the corporation had been originally indebted for money advanced to it and gave its note to its creditor for the amount. The creditor then transferred the note to the plaintiff. The trial court found the note to be invalid as against the corporation, because of want of authority for its execution, but found that the original indebtedness of the corporation had been assigned by the original creditor to the plaintiff and granted a recovery upon it. On appeal, this finding of an assignment was attacked as not supported by the evidence. The only evidence on the point was that the note had been transferred to the plaintiff. It was held that this was enough; that the transfer of the note was in fact a transfer of the original debt as between the original creditor and the plaintiff, although the note was void as to the corporation. If the transfer of a void note be in effect an assignment of the indebtedness which it was intended to evidence, much more must the transfer of a valid note be in effect an assignment of the indebtedness which it does in fact evidence. See, also, 7 Cyc. 816; Harris v. Johnston, 7 U. S. (3 Cranch) 317, 2 L. Ed. 450; Looney v. District of Columbia, 113 U. S. 258, 5 Sup. Ct. 463, 28 L. Ed. 974; Davis v. Reilly, 1 L. R. Q. B. [1898] 1.

In the present case there is no question as to the fact of the transfer of the notes taken for the indebtedness of the woolen company. They were, as we have said, indorsed and delivered to Pike by the payee, the representative of the woolen company's creditors, upon the payment to him of $5,000. The indorsements were special; that is, to the order of Pike. There is no escape from the conclusion that by this transfer the creditors parted, not only with the notes, but with the debts for which the notes were given. In other words, when the plaintiffs brought this action, they were not the owners of or interested in the obligation whose guaranty they seek to enforce in one count, and the stockholder's liability pertaining to which they seek to enforce in the other.

The plaintiffs seek to avoid this conclusion by the claim that the payee did not intend to sell the notes to Pike, but to return them to the woolen company, and rely upon testimony of the payee to that effect. But, whatever he intended, the thing which he did was to transfer the notes by indorsement and delivery, and the legal effect of that which he did cannot be varied in this action, to which Pike is not a party, by evidence that he intended something else. There is, in fact, no evidence here sufficient to warrant a reformation of his transaction with Pike; but, even if there were, it would be immaterial. Until the transaction is reformed, and the transfer in effect canceled, something which can be done only in an action against Pike, the transfer must be given effect. As long as the transfer stands uncanceled, the woolen company is liable to Pike upon the notes. To hold that it was also liable to the plaintiffs upon the original indebtedness for which the notes were given would be to subject it to a double liability for the same obligation.

[3] If the plaintiffs are not the owners of the obligation of the woolen company, as we believe it is plain they are not, it would seem to follow almost as of course that they cannot recover on a guaranty of that obligation, or upon the defendant's liability as a stockholder for his proportion of it. Whatever rights may exist in these respects would seem plainly to be in Pike as the owner of the notes which evidence the basic obligation. Plaintiffs' counsel, nevertheless, contend to the contrary in respect to the guaranty; their argument being that the obligation of the guarantor is an independent obligation, which, of course, it is, in a sense, and therefore not transferred by a transfer of the obligation guaranteed, and cite Black v. Sippy, 15 Or. 574, 16 Pac. 418, as in point. An examination of this case shows, however, that it is rather an authority for the view we have expressed. A statute of Oregon made both husband and wife liable for supplies furnished the family. The defendant's husband purchased certain family supplies, and gave his note for the purchase price. The firm which furnished the supplies then assigned the note to the plaintiff, and, the note not being paid, the plaintiff brought suit, not against the husband on his note, but against the wife upon her statutory liability. If, under these circumstances, it had been held that the obligation of the wife had not passed to the assignee of the note, but remained in the assignor, in whose favor the obligation was originally incurred, the case might perhaps be considered as tending to sustain the position of plaintiffs' counsel here. But that is exactly what was not held. On the contrary, it was held that the transfer of the note, evidencing as it did the debt, transferred the wife's liability for the debt, and the assignee of the note was allowed to recover against her. The decision would seem to be very closely in point here in favor of the view we have expressed. In any case, the correctness of that view seems to us almost self-evident.

LYON & HOAG v. RAILROAD COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 9142.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 11, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 8, 1920.)

1. Constitutional law §278(1)—Eminent domain §2(1)—Compelling public utility to operate at loss is "taking of property without compensation."

The state has no power to compel the continued operation of a public utility at a loss, where the owner of that utility is willing to and does in fact abandon to the public all its property that has been devoted to the public use, since to compel the operation of the public utility at a loss is a taking of property without compensation in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Taking.]

2. Corporations §382½, New, vol. 16 Key-
No. Series—Theory on which a state exercises control over public utilities stated.

The theory on which the state exercises control of a public utility is that the property so used is thereby dedicated to a public use, the owner retaining the right to receive a reasonable compensation for use of the property and for the service performed in the operation and maintenance thereof, but, where owner abandons the dedicated property to the public, there is no further basis on which the regulatory power can be predicated.

3. Public Service Commissions §35—Question not raised before Railroad Commission not considered by court on certiorari.

A question not raised before the Railroad Commission will not be considered by court on certiorari to review the commission's order.

4. Waters and water courses §188(3)—Railroad Commission could not compel operation of waterworks at a loss after abandonment thereof.

Where owner of subdivision which had been furnishing water to purchasers of lots in subdivision abandoned the waterworks, and where at the request of the city officials and the Railroad Commission a waterworks company took charge and operated the waterworks so abandoned, Railroad Commission was powerless to compel the subdivision owner to resume operation at a loss.

Application for certiorari by Lyon & Hoag, a corporation, against the Railroad Commission and others, to review order of said Commission. Order annulled.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, and Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for petitioner.
Hugh Gordon, of Los Angeles (Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for Railroad Commission.

Stoney, Rouleau, Stoney & Palmer, of San Francisco, for other respondents.

WILBUR, J. Petitioner seeks the review of an order of the Railroad Commission requiring it to re-establish its service of domestic water in a certain residence district of the city and county of San Francisco known as Lincoln Manor. Petitioner subdivided this tract, and, for the purpose of furnishing domestic water to the purchasers of lots therein, laid water pipes in the streets thereof, purchased water from the Spring Valley Water Company, and, by means of a pumping system, distributed it to the purchasers of lots within the tract. As fast as lots were sold and water connections desired for residences located thereon the same were made. The same water rates were charged by the petitioner as by the Spring Valley Water Company. As soon as all the lots in the tract were sold, the petitioner discontinued said water service and offered to give its water system free of charge to the Spring Valley Water Company for the purpose of a continuance of such service by the latter company. Inasmuch as said service required an expenditure for pumping the water, the latter company refused to accept the responsibility. The lot owners appealed to the Railroad Commission for relief, and, upon the hearing of their petition, an order was made requiring the petitioner to resume such service.

Petitioner claims that it is not a public utility. It also claims, if it is a public utility, that the control over it is vested in the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, and not in the Railroad Commission. In view of our conclusion that the state has no power, either directly or through the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco or the Railroad Commission of the state of California, to make the order in question, it is unnecessary to determine either of the foregoing points raised by the petitioner.

[1] The state has no power to compel the continued operation of a public utility at a loss, where the owner of that utility is willing to and does in fact abandon to the public all its property that has been devoted to the public use. Since the submission of this case the Supreme Court of the United States has passed upon this question, and for that reason a discussion of the various decisions cited by the respondent in support of the order of the Railroad Commission is unnecessary. That court decided that "a carrier cannot be compelled to carry on even a branch of its business at a loss, much less the whole business of carriage." Brooks-Scanlon Co. v. Railroad Commission of Louisiana, 251 U. S. 396, 40 Sup. Ct. 183, 64 L. Ed. —. A similar conclusion was suggested by our earlier decision in Fellows v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 52, 64, 90 Pac. 137, 141, where it was said:

"We do not mean to say that a corporation engaged in the distribution of water to public uses may not abandon its property and quit the business, without being subject to mandatory proceedings to compel it to continue to carry it on. It may find it impossible to go on. Its supply may become exhausted or be insufficient for paramount needs; the rates fixed by law may be too small to enable it to operate at a profit or without substantial loss; or it may conclude, without reason which the law would consider sufficient, that it will not continue. In case of a natural person it might become physically impossible. We do not intend to declare that in any such case mandatory process would be issued to compel the personal performance of the duty. These questions are not now involved and we express no opinion concerning them."

[2] The basis of the conclusion that the state cannot compel the operation of a public utility at a loss is that such an order is a taking of property without compensation and therefore violates the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution. Brooks-Scanlon Co. v. R. R. Comm., supra; North Pac. Ry. Co. v. North Dakota, 236 U. S. 585, 35 Sup. Ct. 429, 59 L. Ed. 735, L. R. A. 1917F, 1148, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1; Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. West Virginia, 236 U. S. 605, 35 Sup. Ct. 437, 59 L. Ed. 745. The theory on which the state exercises control over a public utility is that the property so used is thereby dedicated to a public use. The dedication is qualified, however, in that the owner retains the right to receive a reasonable compensation for use of such property and for the service performed in the operation and maintenance thereof. Where, as in this case, the owner is willing to and does in fact abandon all the dedicated property to the public, there is no further basis upon which the regulatory power can be predicated. To require the former owner, after such abandonment, to continue to operate the property at a loss for the benefit of the public, would be a taking of such excessive cost of operation from such owner without compensation. The numerous cases cited by the respondent merely hold that a public corporation can be required to operate certain portions of its system at a loss, where the general business of which such system forms a part can be profitably operated. State ex rel. Caster v. Kansas Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 96 Kan. 298, 150 Pac. 544; State ex rel. Public Service Commission v. Missouri Southern Railroad Co., 214 S. W. 381; People ex rel. Hubbard v. Colorado Title & Trust Co., 178 Pac. 6.

[3, 4] No case has been cited in which it has been held that authority exists to compel a public utility to operate at a loss on its whole system and investment, and the foregoing decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States determine that it cannot be done. This, we understand, is fully conceded by the respondent Railroad Commission. It contends, however, that the petitioner should be compelled to continue the service for a reasonable time pending its application to the Railroad Commission for leave to abandon its service, of for increased rates to enable it to profitably continue such service. No such question was raised before the Railroad Commission. There the whole controversy was as to whether or not the petitioner was a public utility corporation and subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission. The commission found that petitioner had wholly abandoned its water pipes and pumping plant August 10, 1918, and that thereafter the same had been operated and used by the Spring Valley Water Company at the request of the city officials of San Francisco and of the Railroad Commission. The order of the Railroad Commission under review was made June 10, 1919. We conclude that after such a complete abandonment to the public of all its property devoted to a public use the Railroad Commission is powerless to compel the petitioner to resume operations at a loss. The order of the Railroad Commission required the petitioner to resume service, without additional compensation, and therefore at a continued loss.

The order under review is annulled.

BROWN v. ANDERSON-COTTONWOOD IRR. DIST. (S. F. 9126.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1920.)

1. Lost instruments ⇨7—Complaint for reissuance of lost bond held insufficient.

In action against irrigation district for reissuance of lost bond, complaint held insufficient to entitle plaintiff to relief under Civ. Code, § 329, in that it failed to allege that the bond had been lost or destroyed in the state, or in a calamity such as a fire or earthquake, as required by such statute.

2. Lost instruments ⇨3—Equity can give relief, notwithstanding special statutory proceeding.

The restoration of lost instruments is an old and well-established function of equity; its jurisdiction in such respect not being impaired by the enactment of statutes providing for special proceedings for the same purpose, unless the intent to make such special proceedings exclusive appears.

3. Lost instruments ⇨7—Complaint held sufficient to give equity jurisdiction.

Complaint held to state facts entitling plaintiff to decree in equity requiring reissuance by defendant irrigation district of lost bond, notwithstanding insufficiency of complaint under Civ. Code, § 329; such statute not impairing the jurisdiction of equity to afford relief.

4. Lost instruments ⇨3—Demand for duplicate bond not a condition precedent.

A demand on irrigation district for issuance of duplicate bond was not a condition precedent to an action in equity by owner of lost bond for reissuance of bond.

5. Lost instruments ⇨10—Decree canceling original bond in suit for reissuance of lost bond improper.

In action in equity against irrigation district for reissuance of lost bond, plaintiff was not entitled to decree canceling the original bond, since, such action not being in rem, the decree would not be effective as to third persons, who might get possession of original bond with right to enforce it.

6. Lost instruments ⇨2 — Duplicate bond pursuant to decree does not impose liability, where original bond is capable of enforcement.

Owner of lost irrigation bond, who has procured issuance of duplicate in equitable action therefor, cannot enforce bond against irrigation district, where the lost bond subsequently appears in the hands of a third person entitled to enforce it against the district.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Ada I. Brown against the Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed, as modified.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against it upon its failure to answer after the overruling of a demurrer which it had interposed to the plaintiff's complaint. The question is therefore as to the sufficiency of the complaint.

[1] The complaint alleged in brief that the plaintiff was the owner of a $1,000 bond issued by the defendant, a public irrigation district, and that the bond had been lost, and prayed for a decree directing the issuance to the plaintiff of a new bond, and the cancellation of the one lost. The prayer and certain of the allegations of the complaint make it certain that the plaintiff had in mind to proceed under section 329 of the Civil Code. That section provides that—

"Whenever a bond * * * of a corporation * * * has * * * been lost or destroyed in this state by fire, earthquake, or other calamity, the owner thereof may bring an action against such corporation * * * for the purpose of obtaining a new or duplicate bond. * * *"

The principal ground of demurrer to the complaint was that it alleged merely that the bond had been lost or destroyed, and not that it had been lost or destroyed in this state, or in any calamity such as a fire or earthquake. Viewed as the initiation of a proceeding under the Code section, the complaint was certainly insufficient in these particulars. The section by its terms plainly applies only to a loss or destruction in this state through some calamity, such as a fire or earthquake, and this the complaint did not allege.

[2] But it does not follow that the complaint was open to demurrer as failing to show a case wherein the plaintiff was entitled to relief. The Code section does not purport to prescribe the only case in which a lost or destroyed instrument may be restored, or to prescribe the procedure which alone can be followed to obtain such restoration. It provides merely that in certain cases a certain procedure may be followed for that purpose. The restoration of lost instruments is an old and well-established function of courts of equity, and it is likewise well established that their jurisdiction in this respect is not impaired by the passage of statutes providing for special proceedings for the same purpose, unless the intent to make such special proceedings exclusive appears. 25 Cyc. 1609. Such intent does not appear in the statutes of this state.

[3] Viewed, not as the initiation of a proceeding under the Code section, but as the equivalent under our reformed procedure of a bill in equity, the complaint is sufficient in the particulars under discussion, since to entitle the plaintiff to relief in equity the loss or destruction of the instrument is alone sufficient, and it is not necessary that it be lost or destroyed in any particular manner. It is wholly immaterial that the plaintiff mistakenly conceived that upon the facts stated in the complaint she was entitled to maintain an action under the authority of the Code section. It was necessary only that the complaint show that she had in fact a cause of action of some sort, and was entitled to relief. Showing this, the complaint is sufficient, and, the truth of its allegations being established either by evidence or by the admission of the defendant, as by its failure to answer, the plaintiff is entitled to have the relief which the facts established justify, although that relief may not be exactly what she conceived she was entitled to.

[4] The defendant also makes the point that viewed as the equivalent of a bill in equity, the complaint is yet insufficient because it fails to allege any demand upon the defendant for the issuance of a duplicate bond before the commencement of the action. It is true that the defendant would not be in the wrong until such demand was made and refused. But a suit in equity of this character is not one for relief against a wrong committed by the defendant, but is one to enforce a right in the plaintiff. The plaintiff's right to a duplicate bond depends wholly on the loss of the original, and a demand upon the defendant is not an element of the right and therefore not of the plaintiff's cause of action. Under these circumstances, the presence or absence of a prior demand upon and refusal by the defendant is material only on the question of the defendant being liable for costs. The case comes directly within the principle of Randolph v. Harris, 28 Cal. 561, 565, 87 Am. Dec. 139, where in a suit of this character it was held that a prior tender to the defendant of an indemnity bond was material only as to the matter of costs. Upon the point of the plaintiff's right to maintain the suit there is no distinction between a prior demand upon the defendant and a prior tender to it of an indemnity bond. Both are necessary to put the defendant in the wrong, but neither is an element of the right sought to be enforced. If one is not a condition precedent to the right to maintain the suit, there is no reason why the other should be. See, also, Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 266, 282, and Farmer's Exchange Bank v. Altura, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 263, 270, 61 Pac. 1077. The action of the lower court in overruling the defendant's demurrer was therefore correct.

[5] This conclusion, however, does not entirely dispose of the matter. The plaintiff was not entitled to relief under the Code section, but only to such relief as might be given by the court under its general equity powers. The plaintiff, however, after the overruling of the demurrer and the defendant's failure to answer, proceeded under the Code section, and the relief decreed by the judgment was that provided by the Code section. To the extent to which the relief so decreed exceeded or departed from that properly allowable in a suit in equity for the restoration of a lost instrument, the judgment is at fault. The Code section provides for a judgment not merely directing the issuing of a duplicate instrument, but also canceling the original instrument, and the judgment in this case so provides. It is difficult to see how literal effect can be given to this provision, in view of the fact that the original bond is supposedly lost or destroyed, so that its actual cancellation is an impossibility. Presumably what is meant is that the original bond be judicially declared to be null and void. Such a judicial declaration would of course be wholly ineffective as to third persons, unless the action be one in rem. It is not necessary to determine whether an action under the Code section would be of that character.

[6] The present action is not one under the Code section, and is purely in personam. The court not having the power to declare the bond void as to third persons, it should not be declared void as between the plaintiff and defendant. If, in spite of its supposed loss or destruction, it should subsequently appear in the hands of a third person entitled to enforce it against the defendant, the plaintiff should have no right to enforce the duplicate bond issued in substitution for it. But she would have this right, if in the present action the original bond has been declared void as between her and the defendant. The plaintiff has no right to a decree which would or might have this effect. The judgment appealed from is therefore modified, by striking out the last paragraph thereof, beginning with the word "Wherefore," and ending with the word "herein," and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"Wherefore, by reason of the premises, the court does hereby order, adjudge, and decree that in substitution for that certain $1,000 gold bond with attached coupons, specified in the complaint herein, and issued by the defendant herein, Anderson-Cottonwood Irrigation District, and evidencing an obligation of the defendant for the payment of a principal sum of $1,000, with the interest to accrue thereon, the said defendant do execute and issue to Ada I. Brown, the plaintiff herein, a duplicate bond of like tenor and import, together with duplicate coupons attached of like tenor and import, upon the plaintiff paying to the defendant all costs incurred by the latter in the premises, the same being hereby taxed at $——, together with the expenses of the execution and issue of said duplicate bond and coupons, and upon the plaintiff executing unto the defendant an indemnity bond in the sum of $2,000, in form and with sureties approved by the court, indemnifying defendant against any loss or liability which may be suffered by it by reason of the execution and issuance of said duplicate bond and coupons distinct from and in addition to the liability of defendant heretofore evidenced by the bond and coupons for which such duplicate bond and coupons are to be executed and issued in substitution."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed; each party to bear its own costs on appeal.

HUTCHISON v. BARR. (L. A. 6093.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1920.)

1. Pleading ⚡403(5)—Answer in foreclosure suit cured defect in complaint.

Where the answer of defendant successor of mortgagor in suit to foreclose admitted she was owner of the fee of the mortgaged property at commencement of the action, any defect in the complaint resulting from failure to plead such fact was cured.

2. Trial ⚡36, 391—Neither proof nor finding of admitted fact necessary.

In suit to foreclose a mortgage, where the fact that defendant was the owner of the fee at commencement of action was admitted, neither proof nor finding was necessary on such phase of the case.

3. Mortgages ⚡427(1)—Successor in interest of mortgagor could have been made defendant without joining mortgagor.

Defendant in suit to foreclose, as the successor in interest of the mortgagor, could have been made defendant in the first instance, without joining the mortgagor.

4. Mortgages ⚡427(1)—Mortgagor necessary party, if mortgagee insists on deficiency judgment.

In suit to foreclose, the mortgagor was a proper part to the action, and, under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, would have been a necessary party, if plaintiff mortgagee had insisted upon a personal deficiency judgment.

5. Mortgages ⚡427(1)—Dismissal of mortgagor did not affect right to judgment of foreclosure against successor.

Where the right to a deficiency judgment was ultimately abandoned by plaintiff mortgagee in suit to foreclose, and it appeared by the answer of the mortgagor's successor in interest that the mortgagor had divested itself of title, and that its successor was owner in fee, the mortgagor was not a necessary party, and dismissal of it did not affect plaintiff mortgagee's right to obtain judgment of foreclosure.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by D. E. Hutchison against Florence A. Barr and others. From judgment for plaintiff, foreclosing the mortgage, defendant named appeals. Affirmed, with penalty for frivolous appeal.

F. E. Davis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Leland S. Bower, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action—one to foreclose a real property mortgage—was commenced April 3, 1918. The complaint, which was in the usual form of an action to foreclose, alleged, among other things, that the corporation defendant, Walter G. McCarty Company, was, on the 1st day of September, 1914, the owner in fee of the property designated and described in the complaint and that on the said 1st day of September, 1914, the corporation defendant executed to E. W. Grannis, plaintiff's assignor, as security for a promissory note in the sum of $2,000, the mortgage in suit upon the property described in the complaint. Plaintiff's complaint failed, however, to allege who was the owner of the mortgaged property at the time of the commencement of the action. The defendant Florence A. Barr was made a defendant in the action upon the allegation that she, as purchaser, had or claimed some interest in the mortgaged property which was subordinate to and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage. The record shows an entry of her default for failure to answer within the time allowed therefor. The record is silent, however, as to whether the default was set aside; but it presumably was, for the record shows that this defendant later "for herself alone, and not for her codefendants," answered the plaintiff's complaint.

In her answer, after denying all of the material allegations of the complaint for lack of information and belief, it was specifically and affirmatively admitted and alleged that defendant Florence A. Barr, as purchaser, had an interest in the mortgaged property and was the owner thereof in fee at the time of the commencement of the action. None of the other defendants answered, and shortly prior to the trial of the action the plaintiff directed, and there was thereupon entered, a dismissal of the action as to the mortgagor, the corporation defendant, and all of the other parties originally joined as defendants, save and except the defendant Florence A. Barr. Upon the issues raised by her answer the trial court found in substantial accord with the allegations of the complaint and, among other things, that the corporation defendant executed the note and mortgage in suit on the 1st day of September, 1914, and that on that date the corporation defendant was the owner in fee of the mortgaged property. The findings make no mention of who was the owner of the fee of the mortgaged property at the time of the commencement of the action, but there is a finding "that the defendant Florence A. Barr has an interest in said * * * real property and that her said interest is subsequent to and subject to plaintiff's mortgage lien," and the judgment provided that she be paid any surplus over and above the mortgage indebtedness. Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff, foreclosing the mortgage, from which the defendant Florence A. Barr alone has appealed upon the judgment roll.

[1] The answer of the defendant Florence A. Barr admitted she was the owner of the fee of the mortgaged property at the time of the commencement of the action, and therefore cured the defect in the complaint, if any, resulting from the failure to plead that fact. Schenck v. Fire Ins. Co., 71 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. 807; Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 27 Pac. 215, 13 L. R. A. 711; Shively v. Land & Water Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848; County of San Diego v. Seifert, 97 Cal. 594, 32 Pac. 644; Vance v. Anderson, 113 Cal. 532, 45 Pac. 816; Abner Doble Co. v. Keystone Co., 145 Cal. 490, 78 Pac. 1050; McGillivray v. Miller, 3 Cal. App. 188, 84 Pac. 778; Donegan v. Houston, 5 Cal. App. 626, 90 Pac. 1073; Grangers' Union v. Ashe, 12 Cal. App. 757; Merryman v. Kirby, 13 Cal. App. 344, 109 Pac. 635; Pettit v. Forsyth, 15 Cal. App. 149, 113 Pac. 892.

[2] That the defendant Florence A. Barr was the owner of the fee of the mortgaged premises at the time of the commencement of the action was, as we have seen by the averment of her answer, an admitted fact in the case, and consequently neither proof nor finding was necessary upon that phase of the case. Taylor v. C. P. R. R., 67 Cal. 615, 8 Pac. 436; Pratt v. Welcome, 6 Cal. App. 475, 92 Pac. 500; Pomeroy v. Gregory, 66 Cal. 572, 6 Pac. 492; Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 364; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 Pac. 109; Conway v. Supreme Council, 137 Cal. 386, 70 Pac. 223; Muller v. Rowell, 110 Cal. 318, 42 Pac. 804.

[3] The defendant Florence A. Barr, as a successor in interest of the mortgagor, could have been made defendant in the first instance without joining the mortgagor. Cal. Title Ins. Co. v. Miller, 3 Cal. App. 54, 84 Pac. 453; Bigelow v. Bush, 6 Paige (N. Y.) 343; Ingham v. Weed, 5 Cal. Unrep. 645, 48 Pac. 318. The purpose of the action to foreclose was "to subject to sale the title of the mortgagor—that is, such title as he had at the date of his mortgage—and to cut off all the rights of parties subsequently becoming interested therein." Burton v. Lies, 21 Cal. 88, 92; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, 468, 76 Am. Dec. 540; Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 559, 76 Am. Dec. 561.

[4] The mortgagor, the corporation defendant, was a proper party to the action, and would have been a necessary party thereto, if the plaintiff had insisted upon a personal deficiency judgment as was originally prayed for. Code Civ. Proc. § 726. However, inasmuch as the right to a deficiency judgment was ultimately abandoned by plaintiff, and it appearing upon the coming in of the answer of defendant Florence A. Barr that the mortgagor had divested itself of the title to the mortgaged property, and that defendant Florence A. Barr was the owner in fee of the property at the time of the commencement of the action, the mortgagor was no longer a necessary party.

[5] The dismissal of the defendant corporation did not, therefore, affect the right of the plaintiff to obtain a judgment of foreclosure against the defendant Florence A. Barr, for the record as a whole disclosed a cause of action against the grantee of the mortgagor. San Diego Realty Co. v. Hill, 168 Cal. 637, 143 Pac. 1021; McLaughlin v. Stewart, 1 Ont. Law Rep. 295; 27 Cyc. 1583.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed, with a penalty of $50 against the defendant Florence A. Barr for the institution and prosecution of a frivolous appeal.

CONNER v. BANK OF BAKERSFIELD
(two cases). (L. A. 6025, 6058.)(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 15, 1920.)1. Judgment ⇨713(2)—Conclusive on matters in issue or which might have been decided.

A judgment is conclusive in all other actions involving the same question, and on all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided.

2. Interpleader ⇨26—Defendant can put in issue plaintiff's right to compel interpleader.

Defendant in interpleader has the right to put in issue the question whether or not the facts are such as to entitle plaintiff to compel defendants to interplead.

3. Interpleader ⇨32—Right to compel interpleader only question which can be litigated.

In action to compel interpleader, the only question which can be litigated between plaintiff and defendants is the right to compel interpleader, and neither defendant can obtain affirmative relief against plaintiff, and their claims against him arising out of the subject-matter of the interpleader cannot be put in issue.

4. Interpleader ⇨11—Bank entitled to interplead conflicting claimants of fund.

Where a bank was holder of a fund admittedly due from it in which it claimed no interest, but there were conflicting claims to the fund between which the bank could not decide without risk of injury to itself, under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, it had the right to bring an action to compel the conflicting claimants to interplead.

5. Interpleader ⇨10—Plaintiff must be disinterested stakeholder.

Plaintiff in interpleader must be a disinterested stakeholder, and dispute as to the amount due is fatal to the action.

6. Interpleader ⇨10—Bank could not have interpleaded adverse claimants of proceeds of interest-bearing check.

Had a check for the proceeds of which the bank on which it was drawn required adverse claimants to interplead itself been interest-bearing, claim of one of the claimants to interest would have had the effect of putting in issue the extent of the obligation of the bank on the check, and the action could not have been maintained.

7. Judgment ⇨713(2) — Estoppel in subsequent action to claim greater obligation than admitted in interpleader suit.

If a defendant in an interpleader suit failed to question the extent of the obligation of plaintiff, he is estopped from later attempting to claim a greater obligation than that admitted and consented to in the interpleader.

8. Interpleader ⇨32 — Bank Interpleading drawer and holder of certified check could not be compelled to litigate other liability.

A bank which interpleaded its depositor, who drew a certified check, and the holder of the check, could not have been compelled to litigate any liability in the action other than its admitted one for the amount of the check until it was first determined on which contract, the one with the depositor, or the one effected by the certification, it was liable.

9. Judgment ⇨590(4)—Defendant did not waive claim to damages by failing to set it up as bar to suit for interpleader.

Holder of a certified check did not waive her claim for damages against the bank through its failure to pay it, by failing to set up such claim as a bar to the bank's interpleader suit against herself and the drawer of the check, on the ground the bank had an interest in the outcome of the litigation because of its liability for damages, if the holder was found entitled to payment.

10. Interpleader ⇨10—Interest of plaintiff to defeat suit must be in subject-matter.

An interest of plaintiff in interpleader to defeat the relief prayed must be in the very thing or fund itself which is the subject-matter of the controversy.

11. Interest ⇨61—No action for interest as damages after payment in absence of agreement.

Ordinarily interest which is allowed as damages is strictly incidental to the debt, and no action for such damages can be maintained after the debt ceases by payment of the principal as such, in the absence of an agreement reserving the right, in view of Civ. Code, § 3290, a rule which cannot be invoked where the conditions of payment are such that the person entitled cannot assert the claim to damages at time of payment.

12. Interest ⇨62—Bank which severed claim to interest as damages from obligation on certified check cannot complain of subsequent action for such damages.

Where a bank which had certified a check severed the holder's claim to interest as damages for failure to pay from the original obligation by compelling the holder to prove her right to the amount of the check in its interpleader suit against the holder and the drawer without giving the holder an opportunity to present her claim for damages, it cannot complain of the holder's subsequent action for such interest as damages.

13. Interest ⇨20—Deposit of fund in court in interpleader action stopped running.

Holder of certified check, which bank failed to pay, interpleading drawer and holder for proceeds, held entitled, as damages for the failure to pay, only to interest from the date of the refusal to the date of the deposit of the fund in court in its interpleader action.

Department 2.

Appeals from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Sarah L. Conner, executrix of the last will of C. L. Conner, deceased, against the Bank of Bakersfield, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

Peter A. Breen, of San Francisco, and C. C. Cowgill, of Sonoma, for plaintiff.

J. W. Wiley and Wiley & Lambert, all of Bakersfield, for defendant.

LENNON, J. On July 21, 1910, defendant, the Bank of Bakersfield, certified a check in the sum of $3,799.66, drawn by G. J. Plantz and payable to the Kern Valley Bank. Plantz then delivered the check to the Kern Valley Bank for the account of C. L. Conner. Conner died a short time thereafter and plaintiff herein was appointed executrix of his will. On May 19, 1911, plaintiff presented said check to the Bank of Bakersfield, which refused payment. On July 20, 1911, this bank commenced an action in interpleader requesting that said executrix and Plantz be required to set out their conflicting claims to the money called for by the check. The executrix and Plantz thereupon interpleaded between themselves and the case came on for trial on September 21, 1912, on which date the amount of the check, namely, $3,799.66, was deposited in court by the bank. On December 9, 1912, the court rendered judgment in favor of the executrix and on March 6, 1917, when this judgment became final, the fund deposited in court was paid by the clerk to the executrix in accordance with the judgment. The present action was brought by the executrix to recover from the Bank of Bakersfield damages for its refusal to pay the check when presented. The lower court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and ordered judgment thereon in favor of defendant, which judgment was reversed by this court. Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, 174 Cal. 400, 163 Pac. 353. Defendant then answered. At the trial plaintiff waived all claims for damages except the claim for interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum on said $3,799.66 from May 19, 1911, to March 6, 1917. The court gave judgment for plaintiff for $356.10 as damages; that sum being interest at 7 per cent. on $3,799.66 from May 19, 1911, the date of the presentation of said check, to September 21, 1912, the date of deposit in court. The bank appeals from this judgment, claiming that plaintiff is not entitled to any damages. An appeal is also taken by the executrix, who contends that the amount awarded is too small. The appeals were presented together.

The contention of the bank in this case is that the plaintiff herein, by stipulating in the interpleader suit that the bank was only a stakeholder in so far as the interpleader suit was concerned, and that the check might be deposited in court, and by litigating her claim to the fund without objection, released the bank from any liability for damages.

"In Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, it is said: 'The general principle announced in numerous cases in this court is that the right, question, or fact, definitely put in issue and directly determined by the court of competent jurisdiction as a ground of recovery, cannot be contested in a subsequent dispute between the same parties or their privies.'" Green v. Thornton, 130 Cal. 482, 485, 62 Pac. 750, 751.

[1] Moreover, a judgment is conclusive in all other actions involving the same question and upon all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided in the case. Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 176, 68 Pac. 597. A party cannot, however, be held to be precluded from pursuing, in a subsequent action, matters which were not within the issues in the former action, and the present plaintiff can only be held to have waived her right to obtain damages for the refusal to pay the check in the event that she was entitled to set up this right in the interpleader suit and failed to do so.

[2] A defendant in interpleader has the right to put in issue the question as to whether or not the facts were such as to entitle the plaintiff to compel the defendants to interplead. It has therefore been held in effect that, if the defendants in interpleader have fully litigated their claims without objection, they will be deemed to have consented to the remedy invoked and granted, and will not later be heard to object that the plaintiff's complaint did not state a cause of action for interpleader or that plaintiff's obligation to them was anything more or less than they consented and acknowledged it to be in the first instance for the purposes of interpleader. San Francisco Savings Union v. Long, 123 Cal. 107, 55 Pac. 708.

[3] However, in an action to compel interpleader, the only question which can be litigated between the plaintiff and the defendants therein is the right to compel interpleader. Neither of the defendants in such an action can obtain affirmative relief against the plaintiff and their claims against the plaintiff, if any, arising out of the subject-matter of the interpleader, cannot be put in issue in the interpleader suit, but will be considered only when presented in another and different action. Los Angeles v. Amidor, 140 Cal. 400, 73 Pac. 1049; Conner v. Bank of Bakersfield, supra.

[4, 5] The Bank of Bakersfield was the holder of a fund which admittedly was due from it and in which it claimed no interest whatever, but there were conflicting claims to the fund between which the bank could not decide without risk of injury to itself. It therefore had the right to bring an action to compel the conflicting claimants to the fund to interplead. Code Civ. Proc. § 386. It is true that the plaintiff in interpleader must be a disinterested stakeholder and a dispute as to the amount due is fatal to the action.

[6, 7] Had the check itself been interest-bearing, plaintiff's claim to interest would have had the effect of putting in issue the extent of the obligation of the bank on the check and, therefore, the action could not have been maintained. Appeal of the Bridesburg Manufacturing Co., 106 Pa. 275. In such a case, if a defendant failed to question the extent of the obligation of the plaintiff, he would be estopped from later attempting to claim a greater obligation than that admitted and consented to in the interpleader. But in the instant case the check was not interest-bearing, and there is no question but that the amount deposited by the bank in the interpleader suit was all that was due on the bank's original obligation.

[8] In the interpleader suit the bank admitted an obligation due either to a depositor, Plantz, or the holder of a certified check, the executrix. Both obligations were contractual in nature, and no other or different liability was admitted by the bank in that action, nor could it have been compelled to litigate any liability in that action. No claim for damages for breach of contract could be litigated until it was first determined upon which contract the bank was liable, and it was for the purpose of determining the latter question that the interpleader suit was brought. The claim now set up by the executrix is a claim for damages for breach of contract by refusing to pay on demand, the measure of such damages being interest on the amount of the check from the date of the refusal, and it was incumbent upon the executrix to prove her right to receive payment as against Plantz before asserting this claim to damages. While the bank admitted its liability on the original obligation to whichever defendant proved his claim to be superior, it admitted no liability for refusal to pay on demand, and, for all that appeared in the interpleader suit, it might have had defenses to a claim for damages for breach of contract, such as insufficiency of the demand for payment, etc.

[9, 10] The claim for damages for breach of contract was therefore dependent upon the outcome of the interpleader suit, but could not be litigated in that suit, for it was a claim for affirmative relief by one of the defendants against the plaintiff, and was not part of the original obligation which constituted the subject-matter of the controversy. Los Angeles v. Amidor, supra. Nor did the executrix waive her claim to damages by failing to set it up as a bar to the interpleader suit upon the ground that the bank had an interest in the outcome of the litigation because of its liability for damages in the event that the executrix was found to have been entitled to payment. The interest of the bank was not of such a nature as to prevent it from being a mere stakeholder of the fund which was the subject-matter of the interpleader suit. An interest of the plaintiff in interpleader in order to defeat the relief therein prayed for, must be in the very thing or fund itself, which is the subject-matter of the controversy.

"An interest in the legal question at issue to be determined by the result of the litigation will not prejudice the plaintiff's right to the relief. If, therefore, the plaintiff has with respect to other property not the subject-matter of the present suit, an interest that one of the defendants shall succeed, because the decision thus made will be favorable to his own future litigation concerning that other property—this is no objection to his maintaining a suit for an interpleader." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, vol. 4, § 1472; Oppenheim v. Wolf, 3 Sandf. Ch. (N. Y.) 571.

[11, 12] Ordinarily interest which is allowed as damages is strictly incidental to the debt and no action for such damages can be maintained after the debt ceases by payment of the principal as such in the absence of an agreement reserving the right. Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) vol. 1, § 372; Civ. Code, § 3290. This rule cannot be invoked, however, where the conditions of payment are such that the person entitled to payment is precluded from asserting the claim to damages at the time of payment. The bank severed the claim to interest as damages from the original obligation by compelling the executrix to prove her right to the amount of the check in the interpleader suit without an opportunity to present the claim for damages. The bank is not, therefore, in a position to complain of the present action. McDonald v. Holdom, 208 Ill. 128, 70 N. E. 21.

The statements in the conclusions of law and judgment of the court in the interpleader suit to the effect that upon payment to the executrix the bank should be absolved from further liability on the check to both or either of said defendants undoubtedly refer to the liability for the amount of the check alone, which, as above stated, was the only liability on the part of the bank which could have been passed upon by the court under the issues in that case. Likewise the stipulation was not extraneous in its application, but went only to the extent of recognizing the bank as a stakeholder for the purposes of the interpleader action.

[13] While the present plaintiff is not estopped from bringing this action for damages, she cannot be held entitled to a greater amount of damages than that awarded by the trial court, namely, interest from the date of refusal to the date of deposit in court. This is so because:

"Where there is a legal contest between persons other than the debtor, rendering it doubtful to whom the debt should be paid, the debtor is not generally chargeable with interest during such contest, although if the fund in such cases has been used by the debtor and has earned interest the court will allow interest thereon notwithstanding the pendency of the litigation."
* * * Where a fund in litigation or the amount of a disputed claim is deposited in court, or subject to its order, interest is not recoverable thereon during the time it remains so deposited." 22 Cyc. p. 1558.

"Where a bill of interpleader is properly filed, the payment of the money into court stops the running of interest; but if the fund is not paid into court it is proper to compute interest up to the rendition of the final decree." 23 Cyc. 29; Sutherland on Damages (4th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 1223.

When a debtor has deposited the money beyond his control in the custody of the court and within the reach of the rightful owner he has done all that the law requires of him. Under such circumstances, in the absence of fraud or collusion, he cannot be held for damages for a continuing breach of contract because of the wrongful claims of third parties. If the plaintiff in interpleader were liable for interest as damages from the date of the refusal to pay until the payment to the person entitled, the burden of the loss caused by the necessity of deciding between conflicting claims would be thrust upon the innocent stakeholder, thus producing the very result which the action of interpleader was designed to avoid.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re MCGREW.

Appeal of GILBERT.

(S. F. 9141.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 16, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 15, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A fact finding supported by evidence, though conflicting, will not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Adoption §3—Statutory requirements must be strictly followed.

The proceeding for adoption is a special one, and the requirements of the statute must be strictly construed, particularly with respect to the jurisdiction of the court.

3. Adoption §10—Only court of county of petitioner's residence has jurisdiction to order adoption.

Under Civ. Code, § 226, declaring that one who desires to adopt a child may for that purpose petition the superior court of the county in which the petitioner resides, the court of the county in which the person desiring to adopt the child resides is the only one which has jurisdiction to declare and order an adoption, so an order of adoption of the superior court of a county of which the petitioner was not a resident is void for want of jurisdiction.

4. Bastards §13—Father of illegitimate child may adopt.

Under Civ. Code, § 230, the father of an illegitimate child may adopt it, so that it will be deemed legitimate, though he is not married to the mother, by receiving it into his home, though the home into which he receives it, etc., is one in which he and the mother are living.

5. Adoption §16—Father who had adopted bastard has sufficient interest to attack adoption by another.

The father of a bastard who had adopted the child by receiving it in his home so as to give it the rights of a legitimate child, under Civ. Code, § 230, has sufficient interest, being not only the natural, but the lawful, father to attack adoption by another.

6. Appeal and error §1167—Mere error of pleading or procedure no ground for reversal.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, the fact that relief from a void order of adoption should have been sought by bill in equity instead of petition or motion, the six-month period allowed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, permitting such attacks, having expired, is no ground for reversing an order setting aside the previous order of adoption; the error being only one of pleading or procedure.

7. Appeal and error §916(1)—No presumption as to how pleading was entitled.

Where a pleading seeking vacation of order of adoption was in all respects a formal pleading, save perhaps the title, which was not shown by the record, the appellate court will not presume anything on the subject; it being claimed the proceeding should be by independent action instead of petition.

8. Judgment §18(3)—Defect in entitling pleading not invalidating judgment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1046, a defect in the title of a pleading will not invalidate a judgment if it intelligibly refers to the action or proceeding; so, where the pleading attacking an order of adoption was in all other respects formal, it cannot be attacked because entitled as a petition instead of an independent pleading.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

In the matter of the adoption of Francella McGrew, a minor. On petition of Leland Chester Zimmerman, an order declaring the child was adopted by Hazel McGrew Gilbert was vacated, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Byron C. Parker, of San Francisco (Thomas P. Wickes, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Dahlin & Jackson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order purporting to vacate a previous order whereby the court had declared that the child, Francelia McGrew, was duly adopted by the appellant, Hazel McGrew, she being then unmarried.

The record shows that the order of adoption was made by a judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on June 19, 1917. The petition for adoption was filed by Hazel McGrew, stating that the child was then six weeks of age and was an illegitimate child of the petitioner's sister, Naomi McGrew, that the petitioner was a resident of San Francisco, was over 21 years of age, and was willing to and desired to adopt said child, and that the mother of the child consented thereto. The consent of the mother was duly signed and filed, and also an agreement by Hazel McGrew, as required by the statute. The order of adoption was in due form and included findings of every fact required by the statute, including the finding that the petitioner, Hazel McGrew, was at that time residing in the city and county of San Francisco.

In May, 1919, the respondent, Zimmerman, filed a petition in the matter of said adoption praying that the order of adoption be vacated, and that he be awarded the care and custody of the child. In his petition he alleged that at the time of filing her petition and of procuring the order of adoption on June 19, 1917, the said petitioner, Hazel McGrew, was not a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, but was a resident of the county of Sonoma, state of California. He further alleged that he was the father of the child, that he and the mother of the child were living together as husband and wife in San Francisco at the time of said adoption, and that after the birth of the child, and prior to June 19, 1917, he had adopted the child as his own legitimate child by publicly acknowledging it as his own child, receiving it into his home, and treating it as if it was his legitimate child in the manner provided in section 230 of the Civil Code; that some ten weeks after the birth of the child he moved to Lassen county, where he secured a better position than he had in San Francisco; that in September, 1917, he was drafted and was held in the service of the United States from that time until the latter part of April, 1919, a short time before he filed said application to vacate the order; and that he had no knowledge whatever of the making of said order of adoption until after his return from overseas. This petition was filed on May 8, 1919.

The court found that these allegations were true, and particularly that at the time of the filing of the petition and obtaining the order of adoption by Hazel McGrew she was not a resident of the city and county of San Francisco, but was a resident of Sonoma county, and that ever since its birth said Zimmerman at all times publicly acknowledged said child as his child and received it with the consent of its mother into his family, where he and its mother resided and kept house together, and at all times since the birth of said child supported and otherwise treated said child as if it were legitimate, and that he thereby adopted the same as his own legitimate child.

[1] It is claimed by the appellant that these findings are not supported by the evidence. We do not deem it necessary to give the details of the evidence. It is sufficient to say, that while there was some conflict, there was satisfactory evidence sufficient to sustain the findings of the court on both propositions. It may be proper to say here also that the father and mother of the child had become acquainted in Sonoma county, and the mother had become pregnant of this child, and that some four months before its birth the father desired to marry the mother and was prevented from so doing by the objections of the girl's mother; that he went with her to San Francisco and there hired rooms in which he lived with her until after said adoption order was made and until the latter part of July, 1917, when he went to Lassen county as aforesaid; that upon being drafted into the army he had made an allotment for the transmission by the government of the legal proportion of his pay to the child's mother for the support of herself and her child in accordance with the federal law on the subject.

[2, 3] The statute provides that one who desires to adopt a child may, "for that purpose, petition the superior court of the county in which the petitioner resides," and it also declares that, if the persons whose consent is necessary are not residents of said county, their written consent may be procured, and must be filed in the superior court of the said county at the time of the application and adoption. Civ. Code, § 226. This means that the court of the county in which the person desiring to adopt the child resides is the only county which has jurisdiction to declare and order an adoption. The proceeding for adoption is a special one, and the requirements of the statute must be strictly construed, particularly with respect to the jurisdiction of the court. Ex parte Clark, 87 Cal. 640, 25 Pac. 967; Estate of Williams, 102 Cal. 77, 36 Pac. 407, 41 Am. St. Rep. 163; Estate of McCombs, 174 Cal. 214, 162 Pac. 897. It follows, therefore, that the order of adoption, being made by a court without jurisdiction, is void.

[4, 5] The appellant objects further that the order, being valid on its face, cannot be set aside or vacated at the instance of any person having no interest in the matter, and that the father of an illegitimate child has no such legal interest as would entitle him to apply to have the order vacated. It is to be observed that the mother of the child died in the early part of April, 1919, prior to the return of the father from the United States service. It may be doubted whether the interest of the father of an illegitimate child in its welfare, after the death of the mother, is insufficient to authorize him to apply to vacate the order of adoption of said child by some other person. The question is not in the case, however, and we need not consider it. The court found that the father had duly adopted it in the manner provided by section 230. In the language of that section, "such child is thereupon deemed for all purposes legitimate from the time of its birth." It is well settled that such adoption can be made by a father of an illegitimate child who has not been married to its mother at the time of such adoption. Garner v. Judd, 136 Cal. 394, 68 Pac. 1026; Baker v. Jones, 166 Cal. 113, 135 Pac. 288; Estate of McNamara, 183 Pac. 552. These cases also declare that such adoption may be made, although the only home the father has and the home in which he receives it is a home in which he is living with the mother as husband and wife, although they are not married. Consequently Zimmerman was not only the natural father, but was also the lawful father, of the child and as such he had the legal status necessary to authorize him to maintain this proceeding to vacate the order.

[6-8] Appellant also objects to the procedure followed by Zimmerman. She contends that the six months allowed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure within which to apply for relief by motion or petition in the case itself had fully expired before the petition was filed, and that the only other mode by which relief on the ground of fraud or mistake can be obtained is by an action in the nature of a bill in equity. If the point were good, a proposition which it is not necessary here to determine, it would not be sufficient as ground for reversal, since it would be an error in procedure and pleading only. Const., art. 6, § 4½. But it is not well taken. The record shows that the petition of Zimmerman stated facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to set aside the order on the grounds that it was procured by fraud and that it was made by a tribunal that had no jurisdiction to act in the matter, that a copy of the petition and order to show cause was duly served on the appellant, and that she appeared in court at the trial and contested the matter without making any objection to the form of the proceeding, or to the manner of service of process. It does not even appear that the pleading filed by Zimmerman and said to be a petition was not in fact and form a complaint in an independent action to vacate the order of adoption. It is in all formal respects a pleading of that character, except perhaps in the title, and the record before us does not show how the paper is entitled. So far as we know, it was properly entitled as an independent action, and we will not presume anything on that subject which is not shown by the record. A mere defect in the title of a paper in the case does not operate to invalidate a judgment if it intelligently refers to the action or proceeding. Code Civ. Proc., § 1046. The order appealed from is affirmed.

SAUNDERS v. SIMMS. (L. A. 5439.)

1. Executors and administrators ⇨202(1) — Enforcement of revived judgment not limited to execution.

Code Civ. Proc. § 685, which has an introductory clause, "execution after five years," and thereafter provides that judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years by leave of the court, does not limit enforcement of a judgment revived by leave of the court to enforcement by execution, but permits its enforcement by claim and suit against the administrator of the estate of a judgment debtor as provided by sections 1498, 1504, 1505.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨421—Suit to enforce payment of judgment not action for new judgment.

A suit against administrator based on a judgment against deceased to obtain judgment for payment of the claim against the estate in due course of administration is not an action for new judgment liability, but, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1504, only establishes the validity of the claim the same as if it had been allowed by the administrator and approved by the court.

3. Judgment ⇨855—Statute for relief of judgment gives courts discretion to remove limitations.

Code Civ. Proc. § 685, authorizing enforcement of judgments after lapse of five years by leave of the court, merely authorizes the courts in their discretion to permit the enforcement by the ordinary process provided by law of a judgment otherwise barred by section 336.

4. Divorce ⇨311—Child cannot satisfy judgment against father for support furnished by mother.

Where, in divorce proceedings, the custody of a minor daughter has been awarded to her mother and her father was ordered to pay fixed sums for her support until her majority, a release of the father by the daughter after she became of age is no bar against recovery by the mother, who provided support for the daughter, of the unpaid installments.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by Alpharetta Saunders against Dan W. Simms as administrator with the will an-nixed of the estate of Albert S. Collins, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Simms & Fulwider, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. V. Weisel, of Anaheim, and William & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The respondent on this appeal obtained a judgment in her action for divorce against her husband, Albert S. Collins, awarding her the custody of their minor child, Lida Collins, and requiring the defendant to pay to plaintiff, respondent here, the sum of $15 per month for the support of the minor. No payments were made under this judgment. Respondent furnished from her own resources the child's maintenance until she became of age. The accrued amounts due, owing, and unpaid at that time under the judgment aggregated the sum of $1,200 besides interest.

The judgment debtor, Albert S. Collins, died in the county of Orange on the 4th of August, 1916, some 16 years after the entry of the judgment and about 10 years after the last installment on the payments fell due. On the 17th of May, 1917, the respondent here applied to the superior court of San Bernardino county, where the original action was had, for leave to enforce the judgment under the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This section in so far as pertinent to this case, is as follows:

"Sec. 685. Execution After Five Years.—In all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings."

The court in this instance made an order that the judgment "may be enforced and carried into effect," and found that with accrued interest the sum of $2,112 was owing and unpaid. The order further recited: "That plaintiff is hereby given the right to enforce the same as provided by law against the estate of Albert S. Collins, deceased."

The judgment thus fortified and revived was thereupon presented as a claim against the estate of the deceased judgment debtor, and upon its rejection by the failure of the administrator to act thereon within ten days suit was instituted by respondent against the administrator in the county of Orange, where the probate proceedings were pending, to have the judgment adjudged a valid claim against the estate, to be paid in due course of administration. Judgment was so made and entered in the superior court of Orange county, and it is from this judgment that the appeal is taken.

Appellant concedes the jurisdiction of the San Bernardino superior court to entertain the motion and to grant leave to enforce the judgment by execution after the period of the statute of limitations had run, but contends that no authority is given, under section 685, to grant any further relief than could be obtained under an execution, and disputes the jurisdiction of the superior court of Orange county to give the judgment appealed from.

[1] We fail to understand upon what theory of construction appellant claims that the relief granted by section 685 in case of a money judgment is limited to enforcement by execution. It is true the text of the section is introduced by the disconnected clause "execution after five years," but it is apparent from the context, which provides that "in all cases the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years," that the word "execution" is used in the broad sense of execution or carrying into effect by such means as are provided by law for the enforcement of various classes of judgments. Where a judgment debtor has died, it is directed by section 1505 of the Code of Civil Procedure that no execution shall issue on the judgment, but that it shall be presented to the executor or administrator like any other claim. Section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that where a claim is rejected the holder may bring suit; and it is declared by section 1504, of Code of Civil Procedure, that a judgment rendered against an executor or administrator "upon any claim for money against the estate" only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and a judge, and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay in due course of administration the amount ascertained to be due. This is the method for enforcing a judgment after the death of a judgment debtor substituted by law in place of enforcement by writ of execution. It is the same procedure that would have been required after the death of the judgment debtor if the statute of limitations had not run on the demand. We see no reason why this sort of relief may not be granted under section 685, as well as that by issuance and levy of a writ of execution.

[2] The suit to obtain judgment for payment of a claim in due course of administration is not, as appellant seems to think, an action to establish a new judgment liability, based upon the old, but, as set forth in section 1504 of the Code of Civil Procedure, only establishes the validity of the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the administrator and approved by the court. Hall v. Cayot, 141 Cal. 13, 74 Pac. 299; Estate of More, 121 Cal. 638, 54 Pac. 148. And it is held that the allowance of a claim is not in any true sense a judgment. Morton v. Adams, 124 Cal. 229, 56 Pac. 1038, 71 Am. St. Rep. 53. There is nothing in Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 489, 91 Pac. 330, and other decisions cited by appellant, contrary to the view expressed. In the cases cited executions were issued because they happened to afford appropriate and adequate relief, but there is nothing to indicate that some other appropriate means for collecting the judgment could not be resorted to in a proper case.

[3] Section 685 is a limitation upon the operation of the statute of limitations under section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the extent that it places within the discretion of the courts the power to authorize the enforcement by the ordinary processes provided by law of a judgment otherwise barred by the statute. That is what was done in this instance.

[4] As a further defense in this action the defendant introduced an agreement of settlement executed between Lida Collins, the daughter, and the administrator of the father's estate, executed after she became of age, in which she attempted to release the estate from liability under this order for maintenance. Appellant argues that the daughter was the real beneficiary of the maintenance fund, and the respondent her mother, merely a trustee. The original judgment of the court directed the payment of this money to the mother to assist her in the support of the child placed in her custody. Having furnished such support from her own resources she is clearly entitled to recover it in this proceeding in her own name and for her own reimbursement, and the trial court properly disregarded the attempted release by the daughter.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

MUNSON v. FISHBURN et al. (L. A. 4909.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 19, 1920.
Rehearing Denied July 19, 1920.)

1. Joint adventures §4(1)—Duty of parties defined.

Associates in a common enterprise have the duty to each other to make full disclosures of any preference or profit not common to all associates.

2. Corporations §30(2) — False representation that option holders were subscribers on same basis warrants rescission.

Option owners and promoters will not be allowed to retain profits realized from the exercise of the option unless the fact of such interest is disclosed in advance, and the claim of disclosure of profits will not relieve them from a rescission or damages because of false representations that they had no interest in the options, but were subscribers to the stock of a corporation on the same basis as plaintiff, whom they thereby induced to subscribe.

3. Fraud §27—False representation that defendants have subscribed for stock on same terms held actionable.

The principle that a false statement as to price paid is actionable is equally applicable to false representations that others have subscribed for corporate stock on the same terms on which it is sought to and did induce plaintiff to subscribe.

4. Corporations §80(12)—Return of stock held to put sellers in statu quo.

Where stock was issued directly to plaintiff from a corporation but, at the instance of defendants and in compliance with their agreement to sell him one share for every dollar subscribed and paid on a syndicate agreement which was induced by fraud, if plaintiff's offer to return the stock to defendants had been accomplished, it would have put defendants in statu quo.

5. Corporations §80(10)—Four months' delay no defense to action by stock subscriber for damages.

Laches arising solely from four months' delay is no defense to an action by subscriber to stock for damages, and this is sufficient to defeat a general demurrer.

6. Corporations §80(10)—Delay of a stock subscriber in bringing action for rescission held not laches.

Where a stock subscriber did not learn of a fraud and his right to rescind until about four months previous to action, and then promptly offered to rescind, his four months' delay in consulting an attorney was not so unreasonable as to amount to laches, where determination of his legal rights was difficult.

7. Corporations §80(10)—Payment of assessments to preserve stock for tender to seller does not prevent rescission.

Plaintiff's payment of corporate stock assessments after discovery of fraud inducing its purchase does not constitute affirmation barring his action for rescission, since he was entitled to preserve the property so he could tender it back.

8. Corporations §80(12) — Damages sufficiently alleged for rescission of purchase of stock.

Allegation that plaintiff was induced to purchase corporate stock at a fictitious value because of representation that defendants had purchased upon the same basis, and that plaintiff subsequently found that they were joint owners with another of options to be purchased by the corporation, and that the value of the stock purchased had never been greater than three-fifths of the fictitious value which he paid, held sufficient allegation of damages for rescission; it not being necessary to plead and prove the precise amount as in case of deceit.

9. Sales §130(2)—Exact damage need not be shown in action for rescission.

In an action for rescission of a sale for fraud, the exact amount of damage need not be shown, provided it be in an appreciable sum.

10. Fraud $\S$ 47, 59(1)—Damages measured by amount paid for stock with 7 per cent. interest less value of stock upon discovering fraud.

Where the action is for damages for fraudulent representations inducing the purchase of corporate stock, plaintiff must allege and prove a definite amount and the measure of damages, which would be the amounts paid, including assessments on the stock, with interest at 7 per cent. from the dates of such payments, less the value of the stock at the time of discovering the fraud.

11. Corporations $\S$ 80(6) — False statement that defendants had purchased stock on same basis held actionable.

Where the value of defendant's connection with a syndicate may not be capable of ascertainment, nevertheless, if plaintiff was induced to purchase corporate stock by defendants' false representations as to their purchase of such stock on the same basis, and thus change his position in reliance thereon, the lessened value of the stock would constitute damage for purpose of rescission, and the complaint on such theory is sufficient.

12. Corporations $\S$ 80(12)—Rescission of purchase of stock induced by fraud not limited to rescission against corporation.

Though defendants were not vested with any discretion in purchasing property for the corporation and never owned the stock which they, by fraudulent representations, induced plaintiff to purchase, yet, where the stock was taken upon their false representations that they had purchased stock on the same basis that plaintiff was induced to purchase, they failed to disclose their interest with another in options on land the company was taking, and plaintiff could rescind as against them, and was not limited to rescission against the corporation.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by S. M. Munson against J. E. Fishburn and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken, John E. Biby, Walter K. Tuller, Edwin A. Meserve, Shirley E. Meserve, and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment on demurrer entered in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff. The action was brought by the plaintiff for the rescission of a contract by which he subscribed to a syndicate to be formed by the defendants to acquire certain land, or for damages if rescission should be found to be inequitable.

It is alleged in the complaint that the defendants J. E. Fishburn, president of the National Bank of California, R. I. Rogers, vice president of said bank, R. A. Rowan & Co., a corporation, and W. H. Joyce were the owners of options to buy a certain tract of 2,800 acres of land in Los Angeles county; that a syndicate was formed for the purchase of said land; that, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to subscribe for shares in the syndicate and thereby become a co-purchaser of the land with the defendants and other subscribers, "defendants and each of them represented to plaintiff that the defendants R. A. Rowan & Co. and W. H. Joyce were the owners of the options to purchase the land"; that the price to the subscribers to the syndicate was $850 per acre, payable as follows: $920,000 in cash on December 9, 1912, and the balance in two installments of equal amount in five and ten years, respectively, from the date of the exercise of the said options; that the said price was about $87.50 per acre in excess of the price to the said option owners, who were to receive and retain the difference for their options and services; that Fishburn and Rogers had subscribed to said syndicate and would pay on an equal basis with the other subscribers the sum of $25,000, respectively, into the said subscription fund of $920,000; "that, relying upon said representations that * * * Fishburn and Rogers had each subscribed the sum of $25,000 to said syndicate agreement on an equal basis with plaintiff and would pay in the amount of their said subscriptions, * * * plaintiff on or about the 10th day of November, 1912, signed said syndicate agreement and subscribed thereto the sum of $5,000," and thereafter paid said sum to defendants Rowan & Co. and Joyce; "that, had it been disclosed to plaintiff that * * * Fishburn and Rogers * * * had an interest in said options or in said profits, plaintiff would not have subscribed to said syndicate agreement or paid in the amount of his said subscription or any part thereof or at all become a party to said syndicate agreement;" that these representations were false in this, "that it was understood and agreed by and between defendants * * * that the amounts of said subscriptions * * * made by * * * Rogers and Fishburn, respectively, when paid in by them, should be returned to them, respectively, as their shares of the profit of $87.50 per acre mentioned in said syndicate agreement as being received and retained by * * * R. A. Rowan & Co. and Joyce"; that Fishburn and Rogers were the owners of a one-tenth interest, respectively, in the options represented to the plaintiff as being owned exclusively by the disclosed option owners, Rowan & Co. and Joyce; that at the time plaintiff signed the syndicate agreement the names of Fishburn and Rogers appeared as subscribers thereto with their subscriptions in the sum of $25,000 each, and that they concealed from and failed to disclose to plaintiff that there was an agreement between them to the effect that the subscriptions of the undisclosed option owners should be returned to them as their share of said profits.

It is further alleged that on December 3, 1912, the amount of the subscription fund having been paid in ahead of time, the purchase of the land was made, and a corporation, known as the Laguna Land & Water Company, organized; that this corporation was capitalized at $2,000,000, and stock was issued and divided into 2,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each; that 920,000 shares of this stock were issued to the option owners, Rowan & Co. and Joyce, in consideration of the transfer of the land to the corporation; that these 920,000 shares were distributed to the subscribers to the syndicate at the rate of one share for each dollar subscribed; that on the same day 25,000 shares were issued to each of the defendants Fishburn and Rogers, although they did not pay their subscriptions until January 24, 1913; that on the last-mentioned date they made a pretended payment to Rowan & Co. and Joyce of the amount of their subscriptions, and that at the same time, and pursuant to the agreement that the amount of their subscriptions, when paid, should be returned to them as their share of the profits, they received back from Rowan & Co. and Joyce the identical amount paid in by them.

The complaint then alleges that the plaintiff first discovered the fraud on June 1, 1915, but was not aware, until some time in November, 1915, of his right to rescind. On November 29, 1915, plaintiff notified the defendants that he rescinded the agreement, tendered back the stock which had been issued to him, demanded his money, and, being refused, brought this suit.

The demurrer was to the second amended complaint as amended, on the following general grounds:

"(1) That the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

"(2) That the same is uncertain in the following respects, and each of them:

"(a) It cannot be ascertained how the payment of $25,000 made by J. E. Fishburn was a pretended or fictitious payment.

"(b) It cannot be ascertained how the payment of $25,000 made by R. I. Rogers was a pretended or fictitious payment."

The demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendants with costs.

[1] 1. It is well settled that associates in a common enterprise, under whatever guise, have a duty to each other to make full disclosure of any preference or profit not common to all of the associates. In Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 97 Pac.

10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106, the defendant had secured an option on a certain tract of land for the sum of $27,500. He told one Whitlock that, if he would find him a purchaser who would pay $33,000 for the property, he (defendant) would pay Whitlock $3,000. Whitlock organized a corporation to make the purchase, and himself subscribed to the fund being raised to make the payment, but he did not disclose to his associates or cosubscribers that he was to get a profit. The court said:

"When he did this, he assumed as to his associates, under a well-established rule of law, a relation analogous to that which exists between partners, and was precluded from making any secret profit out of the contemplated purchase at their expense. The implied understanding between joint purchasers is that each is engaging in an enterprise solely for the mutual and common benefit and advantage of all, and that each has a common interest with the others, according to the amount of his subscription." (Italics ours.)

The principle of that case was followed in California-Calaveras Min. Co. v. Walls, 170 Cal. 285, 293, 149 Pac. 595, 599, which quotes from the syllabus of the former case as follows:

"Promoters of a corporation formed for the express purpose of purchasing a particular piece of property occupy a fiduciary relation to their cosubscribers, and are bound to truthfully declare to their associates any personal interest they may have in the matter of the purchase. Without such disclosures they cannot legally profit at the expense of their associates, and if they were guilty of any misrepresentations of facts or suppression of truth in relation to their personal interest in the proposed purchase, the corporation is entitled to set aside the transaction, or recover compensation for any loss which it has suffered."

See, also, Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 135 Pac. 496; Smith v. Goethe, 147 Cal. 725, 82 Pac. 384; Pacific Vinegar, etc., Works v. Smith, 145 Cal. 352, 361, 78 Pac. 550, 104 Am. St. Rep. 42; Sims v. Petaluma Gaslight Co., 131 Cal. 656, 63 Pac. 1011; San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 121 Cal. 74, 53 Pac. 410.

[2] While it is true that in some of the cases just cited, for example the Calaveras Case, it was not disclosed by the promoters that any one connected with the organization of the enterprise was to get a profit, and in the instant case it was made known to the subscribers that Rowan & Co. and Joyce were to receive the profits, nevertheless the same principle applies. Fishburn and Rogers held themselves out to the public as subscribers who had enough faith in the venture to risk $25,000 on it, and, because of this and the position they occupied in the financial world, plaintiff was induced to subscribe to the syndicate, which he alleges he would not have done had he known that they were interested in the options to an extent equal to the amount of their subscriptions. The law imposed upon these defendants the same duty to disclose their interest in the options as it imposed upon Rowan & Co. and Joyce. There could be no question of plaintiff's right of action if there had been no disclosures as to the profits, for it is well settled that an option holder or promoter will not be allowed to retain profits, realized from the exercise of the option, unless the fact of his interest in the option is disclosed in advance. We think that Fishburn and Rogers, in addition to being option owners, were joint promoters with Rowan & Co. and Joyce, and hence were equally bound to make known to prospective subscribers the nature and extent of their interest in the enterprise. If we understand defendants' position, it is this: That, since the amount of the profits to accrue was fully disclosed to the plaintiff, he will not be heard to complain that he was not informed as to whom the profits would go. But this position ignores the claim of the plaintiff that he is entitled to rescission or damages because of the false representations that Fishburn and Rogers had no interest in the options but were subscribers on the same basis as himself, and that he was induced by these false representations to subscribe, which he would not otherwise have done.

[3] In Talmage v. Sanitary Security Co., 31 App. Div. 498, 52 N. Y. Supp. 139, where three actions were brought to rescind subscriptions to the capital stock of the defendant company and recover the installments paid thereon on the ground that certain men of standing in the community had held themselves out as subscribers, when in reality their stock was given to them, the court said:

"We think that the representations were material. The fact that other persons had subscribed to the stock of the defendant in a large amount (especially that the two experts mentioned had thought well enough of the scheme to invest in it) would naturally influence the determination of the plaintiffs in reference to subscribing to the stock. With the exception of men of extremely cool judgment and great confidence in their own judgment, we all are apt to be influenced in our action and conduct by the action and conduct of our fellows. Especially is this the case in speculations. * * * Now, of course, what concerns the purchaser is the value of the property. In itself, the price paid by the vendor is not of any moment, but it is of vital importance to the purchaser in forming his judgment as to value. The law recognizes this fact, and holds a false statement as to price paid actionable. The principle is equally applicable to representations that other persons have purchased similar property, or subscribed for stock on the same terms upon which it is sought to induce any person to become a subscriber." (Italics ours.)

See, also, Garrett Co. v. Clark, 42 Misc. Rep. 610, 87 N. Y. Supp. 580; Rose v. Merchants' Trust Co., 96 N. Y. Supp. 956, 29

[4] 2. Defendants contend that in any event plaintiff could not have rescission for three reasons:

"First, it was impossible to put defendants in statu quo; second, plaintiff himself was guilty of laches; third, by paying assessments on the stock with full knowledge of the facts plaintiff himself affirmed the transaction."

We think there is no merit in any of these contentions.

As to the first, it is sufficient to point out that the agreement of the defendants was in effect an agreement to sell to the plaintiff one share of the corporate stock for every dollar he subscribed and paid upon the syndicate agreement; that, while it is true that the stock was issued to plaintiff directly from the corporation, nevertheless it was so issued at the instance of the defendants and in compliance with the said agreement; and that, if the offer by the plaintiffs to return to the defendants the stock received by him had been accepted by them, it would have put them in statu quo.

[5, 6] Upon the second point it may be observed that laches arising solely from a delay of four months is no defense to an action for damages, and that this is sufficient to defeat a general demurrer. With regard to the right to rescind the complaint shows that the plaintiff did not discover that Fishburn and Rogers were interested in the profits going to Rowan & Co. and Joyce until after June 1, 1915, and did not learn that he had a right to rescind on account of that fact until some time in November, 1915, and that the offer to rescind was made on November 29, 1915. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case and in view of the difficulty of determining the law as to the rights of a person in the position of the plaintiff, it is not surprising that he did not suspect that he had a right to rescind until he learned in November that other subscribers to the agreement, upon discovering the facts, had effected a rescission. Under the rule applied in Hannah v. Steinman, 159 Cal. 142, 152, 112 Pac. 1094, the delay of four months in consulting an attorney cannot be said to be so unreasonable as to amount to laches.

[7] Nor do we think that defendants' third contention that the payment of assessments by plaintiff after his discovery of the fraud constituted an affirmation of the transaction which bars his cause of action for rescission, if for no other reason than that he was entitled to preserve the property so that he might be in a position to tender it back if he should later seek rescission.

[8, 9] 3. The cause was argued in department and submitted for decision. The submission was subsequently vacated, and the cause set for further argument on the question:

"What injury is it necessary to show in a case where there is a rescission only, as distinguished from a suit for damages?"

In this connection defendants, in their memorandum filed following resubmission, contend that—

"If plaintiff did not show either that the property purchased was worth less than he paid for it or that it would have been worth more than it actually was worth if the representations had been true—in other words, if he did not show pecuniary injury—then he has not shown anything justifying either rescission or damages."

As already appears, it is alleged that at the time the plaintiff paid the $5,000 to Rowan & Co. and Joyce the interest which he thereby acquired had "a fictitious market value" of $5,000, which value was created "by reason of the belief of the subscribers" that Fishburn and Rogers had subscribed on the same basis as the other subscribers, that it subsequently became known to the subscribers that Fishburn and Rogers had not subscribed on the same basis, but were joint owners of the options with the other defendants, and that, by reason of this knowledge, plaintiff's stock became worth no more than $2,500, and has never since been of a greater value than $3,000. In our opinion, this is a sufficient allegation of damages for rescission. It is, of course, well-settled that in an action of damages for deceit the plaintiff must allege and prove the precise amount thereof. But this is not the rule where rescission is sought. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011, was an action for rescission and to recover the money paid by the plaintiff to the defendant as the price of certain corporate stock upon the asserted fraudulent representations of defendant as to patent rights. It is said, at page 387 of 152 Cal., at page 1014 of 92 Pac.:

"It is also claimed that the complaint is insufficient because of the absence of any showing therein that any pecuniary damage was caused by the fraud alleged. It is true that there is no express allegation that plaintiff suffered pecuniary damage therefrom, but in cases of this character this is not necessary. That fraud which has produced, and will produce, no injury will not justify a rescission, nor support an action either for rescission or for damages, is an established principle of law and equity. But there is no rule that the injury must be of such a nature that it can be accurately measured in money. And we know of no rule of pleading which, in an action based upon a rescission between the parties or seeking to enforce such rescission, requires a statement that the fraud complained of had caused or would cause a specific amount of damages. It may be conceded that it must be shown that the plaintiff, by reason of the fraud, suffered an injury of a pecuniary nature, that is, an injury to his property rights, as distinguished from a mere injury to his feelings, but it will be sufficient if the facts alleged show that material injury will necessarily ensue from the fraud, although the amount of the pecuniary loss is not stated."

In Wainscott v. Occidental, etc., Association, 98 Cal. 253, 33 Pac. 88, the plaintiff sued to rescind certain conveyances which he asserted he had been induced to make through the defendant's false representations. The court said:

"If any pecuniary loss is shown to have resulted, the court will not inquire into the extent of the injury; it is sufficient if the party misled has been very slightly prejudiced, if the amount is at all appreciable." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 898. * * * In an action to rescind upon the ground of fraud, the fraud is the essential thing, and, while it must be coupled with loss, injury, damage, the precise amount of such damage is of secondary importance."

This rule finds support in the following quotation from Black on Rescission and Cancellation, vol. 2, p. 901:

"When a stock subscription has been obtained by fraud, the subscriber is entitled to maintain a bill in equity to annul the same, without alleging or proving that he has sustained any pecuniary loss by reason of the fraud."

See, also, Western States Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 195, 135 Pac. 496; Stern v. Lumber Co. (C. C.) 134 Fed. 509; Mack v. Latta, 83 App. Div. 242, 82 N. Y. Supp. 130, 135; Commonwealth Bonding, etc., Co. v. Bomar (Tex. Civ. App.) 169 S. W. 1060; Johns v. Coffee, 74 Wash. 189, 133 Pa. 4; 22 Standard Encyc. Procedure, 1001, note 66; Cook on Corporations, vol. 1, p. 447; Elliott on Contracts, vol. 1, p. 164; 14 Corpus Juris, 614, note 58.

In the recent case of Stillwell v. Rankin, 55 Mont. 130, 174 Pac. 186, the suit was brought to secure the rescission of a contract for the purchase of certain shares of stock. The alleged fraudulent representations upon which plaintiff based his cause of action were as follows: That, plaintiff being a stockholder in the company, defendant, an officer of the company, "stated to plaintiff that 100 shares of the stock had been turned back to the company by a subscriber who was unable to pay for it, and solicited plaintiff to purchase the stock 'to help the said company out,' and plaintiff alleged that 'in reliance thereon he agreed to purchase the stock (which otherwise he would not have purchased).'" We quote from the opinion:

"Is it essential to the statement of a cause of action for the rescission of a contract for fraud that the plaintiff allege that he has suffered pecuniary loss? Authorities may be found which answer in the affirmative and most emphatically but curiously enough do not insist that the amount of such loss is material, if it is at all appreciable. * * * Courts of equity like courts of law, * * * do not concern themselves with wrongs which do not produce injury; but 'injury' and 'pecuniary loss' are not synonymous terms. * * * Most of the courts and text-writers employ the term 'damage' in the sense of injury; a few restrict its meaning to financial loss. We prefer to adhere to the rule which gives to the term its broader significance, as including either pecuniary loss or the alteration of one's position to his prejudice. * * * If the allegations of this complaint are true, plaintiff was induced by fraudulent representations to assume obligations which otherwise he would not have assumed, and to purchase property which otherwise he would not have purchased. We deem the allegations sufficient to disclose damage within the meaning of that term which we adopt." (Italics ours.)

In Vulcan Fire Ins. Co. v. Jorgenson, 33 Cal. App. 763, 166 Pac. 835, the plaintiff sued to recover an alleged balance due on a subscription for certain shares of its capital stock. The defendant set up in his cross-complaint that his subscription was procured upon the false representation that a certain bank president, upon whose integrity and business capacity the defendant placed special reliance, was connected with the insurance corporation, and asked for the rescission of the contract and the recovery of the money paid. Judgment went for the defendant. Among the grounds urged for a reversal of the judgment was:

"That the record contains no allegation, evidence, or finding that the cross-complainant was in any way pecuniarily damaged by the alleged false representations."

The appellate court said:

"That such representations * * * are sufficient to entitle the subscriber to rescind, without proof of pecuniary damage suffered is well settled."

This language was objected to in a petition for a hearing in this court, but the petition was denied. In Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 627, 98 Pac. 1047, 1049, it was said, citing Spreckels v. Gorrill, supra:

"It is not essential to the right to rescind a contract for the purchase of property that the purchaser should be able to show that the property purchased was worth less than he paid for it. It is enough that he was induced by false representations to buy property which would, if the representations had been true, have been worth more than it actually was worth."

The case of Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868, is cited by defendants. In that case the plaintiff had been induced, through false representations made by the defendant as to former profits in conducting the business, to purchase an interest in the defendant's stock of hardware and agricultural implements. The opinion declares:

"The complaint states no cause of action so far as it relates to fraudulent representations respecting the question of former profits of the business. It contains no allegation that the plaintiff was induced thereby to pay a higher price for the goods than he would otherwise have done, nor is it averred that the business was not profitable after the plaintiff bought into it. In other words, there is nothing in the complaint to show that the plaintiff was in any way injured by the representations, admitting them to have been false. * * * In order to entitle a party to rescind a contract, he must not only show the fraud, but that as a result thereof some damage has resulted to him."

It was not held in that case or in any other cited by the defendants nor do we know of any case holding that the damage suffered must be capable of exact calculation in order to entitle the party injured to rescind the contract. It is only necessary that the allegation and proof must show an "appreciable" amount of loss.

[10, 11] Plaintiff alleges, in effect, that he was induced by the false representations to subscribe to the syndicate, and that the shares issued to him would, if the representations had been true, have been worth $2,000 more than their actual value at the time of the discovery of the fraud. By these false representations, it is alleged, the plaintiff was induced to part with his money, and, to the extent of the difference between the alleged market value of the stock, $3,000, and the sum which such stock would have been worth if the representations had been true, $5,000, the plaintiff has suffered a pecuniary loss of $2,000. In every case of fraud, either where damages or rescission is sought, it must be alleged and proved that the complainant has suffered material injury. But it is the character of the fraud constituting the cause of action which determines the extent to which the pleading and proof must go in order to establish damage. As already pointed out, plaintiff assumes to state his cause of action on the alternative theory, that, if he is not entitled to rescission damages may be awarded. First, as to rescission: It is clear from the authorities we have cited that the exact amount of damage need not be shown, provided it be in an "appreciable" sum. Where the action is for damages, however, the plaintiff must allege and prove that by reason of the fraud he has suffered damage in a definite amount. In the one case damage is predicated on the change in position; in the other on the extent of the pecuniary loss. The measure of damages here would be the amounts paid in by the plaintiff, including the assessments, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. from the dates of such payments, less the value of the stock at the time of the discovery of the fraud. Plaintiff alleges that the factor which induced him to subscribe to the syndicate was his confidence in the financial standing and business judgment of Fishburn and Rogers, who, it was represented, had already subscribed for 25,000 shares on the same basis as that upon which he was asked to invest. While the value of the connection of Fishburn and Rogers with the syndicate may not be capable of ascertainment, nevertheless, if the plaintiff was induced by the defendants' false representations to change his position in reliance thereon, the lessened value of the stock would constitute damage for the purpose of rescission. The plaintiff "was placed in a worse position than he otherwise would have been." Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 898. We think the complaint is sufficient under either theory.

[12] 4. Nor can we agree with defendants' contention, made in their memorandum filed following the resubmission of the case:

"If there is any right of rescission, * * * it is a right to rescind against the corporation, and there is no right on the part of a subscriber to rescind a subscription as against other share holders or promoters."

The only authorities which defendants cite on this point are Western Bank v. Addie, L. R. 1 H. L. Cas. 185; Love v. Love, 145 Ill. App. 150, and Sim v. Edenborn (C. C.) 163 Fed. 655. The first of these cases held that the false representations of directors are imputable to the corporation, and one "who has been induced to purchase stock in reliance on such representations cannot be held to his contract." Love v. Love, supra, was a bill in equity for the partition of certain premises, and "the sole question" was "whether the lower court erred in appointing a receiver." Rescission was not in any way involved. In Sim v. Edenborn, supra, the court held that the original complaint outlined a cause of action in equity, while purporting to be a case at law and praying for damages at law. Defendants' demurrer was therefore sustained. But in Heckscher v. Edenborn, 203 N. Y. 210, 96 N. E. 441, a case arising out of the same transaction, the defendant was the principal promoter and organizer of a syndicate, and the plaintiff asked that he be released from a contract which he had made as a subscriber to the syndicate on the ground that the defendant, by inducing him to become a party to the agreement, was guilty of fraud. The court said, at page 226 of 203 N. Y., at page 446 of 96 N. E.:

"It is, of course, true that, in an action between two parties to a contract, one cannot avoid it as against the other, who is entirely innocent, on the ground that he was induced to make it by the fraud of a third party, wholly disconnected with the transaction. So far as I can find, however, this principle has never been applied in an action by the injured party against a person claiming protection as agent under the contract which he had fraudulently induced. But beyond this I do not think that it can be said that the moneys of plaintiff's assignors were not paid to defendant under a contract for his benefit, and to which he was a party. He was the promoter of the enterprise, and procured the execution of the syndicate agreement. By its express terms it was made by each subscriber, not only with the other subscribers, but also with him, as a syndicate manager, and it was for his benefit, not only in authorizing him to purchase the property in question, but also in conferring upon him general powers as a manager. If the contract be regarded as a single one between each subscriber on one side, and his fellow subscribers and the managers on the other, it must follow that the fraud of either of the latter in inducing it would be a ground for rescinding it against all parties. If the agreement should be regarded as embracing two contracts, one made by each subscriber with his fellow subscribers, and a second one made by him with defendant as agent and manager, it may be that in an action between the subscribers the contract could not be avoided, because of the latter's fraud, although I have doubts about that. In Metropolitan Coal Consumers' Case, 66 Law Times [N. S.] 700, it was held, after consideration of the principle now being urged by defendant, that a subscriber could be relieved from a subscription for corporation shares because of false statements made by promoters in a prospectus issued before the corporation was organized, 'although not made by the company or its agents.' But, however this may be, this is an action between the subscriber and the agent, between whom in terms there existed a contract authorizing the transactions here involved, and in view of this and the surrounding circumstances I do not think it possible for the latter to say that he was not a party to the contract and to the transactions which occurred under it, within the rule now being discussed."

In our opinion the principle there invoked is applicable to the facts alleged in this case. The defendants do not question the correctness of this principle, but they attempt to distinguish that case from the one at bar in that: (1) Whereas in the New York case "the property which the corporation acquired was the defendant's own property," here "the defendants never owned the tract of land and never owned the stock"; and (2) the defendants here were not vested with any discretion in purchasing property for the corporation, whereas in the Heckscher Case the defendant was authorized to exercise a discretion. As to the first ground of attempted distinction, we are not disposed to hold that, although defendants held the options on the land in question and undoubtedly did receive any profits there may have been in the transaction, the contract of subscription may not be rescinded as against them, because they did not have the title to the shares which plaintiff received or to the land which those shares represented. Nor, in the view we take, would the other distinction attempted to be drawn by defendants make any difference. Plaintiff's cause of action is based, not on the abuse of any discretion on the part of defendants in purchasing the land on which they held the options, but on their failure to disclose to him the interest which Fishburn and Rogers had therein. As we have said, a fiduciary relationship existed between the defendants and the plaintiff, and, assuming, as we must, that the allegations of the complaint are true, the defendants should not be allowed to reap the benefit arising from their abuse of the confidence reposed in them.

It follows that the demurrer should have been overruled.

Judgment reversed.

47 Cal. App. 290

ARNOLD v. LA BELLE OIL CO.
(Civ. 3181.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California, May 1, 1920.)

1. Corporations —432(4)—Contract purporting to be signed by officers prima facie proof of execution by officers so as to shift burden of proof.

In an action on a contract against a corporation, where the document on its face purported to have been signed by the president and secretary, and had attached thereto and impressed thereon the seal of the corporation, plaintiff made a prima facie case by introducing it in evidence, such showing being sufficient to shift the burden of proof on the corporation to show that the persons signing the contract were not officers.

2. Brokers —43(3)—Letter employing broker to sell land sufficient.

A letter to a broker concerning the sale of land held a sufficient memorandum under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6.

3. Brokers —43(2)—Statute as to appointment of broker does not require formal written contract.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, requiring an agreement employing broker to be in writing, etc., does not require any formal contract; it being sufficient that the fact of employment be expressed in writing, signed by the party to be charged, or his agent.

4. Brokers —43(2)—Statute as to appointment of broker by writing held not to apply to executive corporate officer.

When Civ. Code, § 1624, is construed with and in the light of sections 2309, 2310, requiring an agent's authority to execute a contract in writing to be itself in writing, it does not apply to the executive officers of a corporation, and hence a writing, employing an agent to sell land, was sufficient where signed by an executive officer of the corporation, though the name of the secretary was not appended and the corporate seal was not attached thereto.

5. Corporations —407(3)—Corporation may appoint acting secretary to execute written appointment of broker to sell land.

Assuming that a written appointment of broker by a corporation must be signed by the secretary and the corporate seal attached, under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, a particular person, although not the regularly elected, qualified, or acting secretary, but appointed by the directors to act in the latter's absence, could execute such an instrument in such capacity.

6. Corporations —426(6)—Corporation by resolution of directors could ratify writing appointing broker to sell land.

Assuming that a writing by an executive officer of a corporation employing a broker to sell land was not a sufficient memorandum under Civ. Code, § 1624, because not signed by the secretary of the corporation, such writing became sufficient where the board of directors by resolution ratified the action of the corporate officer executing the writing, under section 2310.

7. Brokers —57(2)—Entitled to agreed compensation on sale to purchaser for less than contemplated.

Where broker was employed to procure a purchaser for land at a certain price per acre, and was to get 5 per cent. of the price, as paid to the owner, he was entitled to such agreed percentage, where he furnished a purchaser at a less price, accepted by the owner.

8. Brokers —57(2)—Subsequent modification of sale contract cannot defeat broker's compensation.

Modification of a contract of sale of land by mutual consent of the owner and a purchaser could not defeat the broker's right to the agreed compensation.

9. Brokers —75—Entitled to compensation as price was paid.

Where broker was to receive 5 per cent. commission "in the manner as and when paid to us," he was entitled to such percentage of all payments made by the purchaser, and was not required to wait until the full purchase price was paid.

10. Brokers —75—Not entitled to percentage out of due, but unpaid, installments.

A broker, entitled to 5 per cent. of the purchase price, "in the manner as and when" payments were received by the owner, was not entitled to recover commissions on payments due, but not yet made, though the purchaser was able, willing, and ready to pay.

11. Appeal and error —768—Failure to deny statement conceded truth on appeal.

Where plaintiff on appeal, on objection of defendant in an action to recover broker's commissions for sale of land to an allowance in the judgment of commissions on unpaid installments, claimed that it was stipulated at the trial that the installments would have been paid by the purchaser had it not been impounded by attachment, and that judgment was to pass for the amount of the commission on such unpaid installment if plaintiff was entitled to judgment at all, it was assumed that appellant conceded the truth of such statement, where he did not deny it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Ralph Arnold against the La Belle Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Black & Black, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. The plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $4,362.43, claimed to be due and unpaid at the time of the commencement of this action, and the further sum of $300, claimed to have become due, owing and unpaid "subsequent to the filing of the original complaint herein and the commencement of this action, and prior to the date of trial," by virtue of certain of the terms of a written instrument, which, in words and figures, is as follows:

"January 15, 1912.

"Mr. Ralph Arnold, 700 H. W. Hellman Building, Los Angeles, California.—Dear Sir: Until further notice, or until the La Belle Oil Company has sold its property in the Midway Oil Field to some other person or persons, you are authorized by us to offer for sale to your clients the north $\frac{1}{2}$ of the southwest quarter of section 4, township 32 south range 23 E. M. D. B. & M. its 80 acres, more or less, at \$4,000.00 per acre, on such terms and conditions as we, i. e. yourself and ourselves may mutually agree upon, and in the event of your effecting a sale of our land in section 4 (above described) or in the event of our effecting sale to any of your clients through your efforts or assistance, we agree to pay you five per cent. (5%) commission on the total sales price, in the manner as and when paid to us.

"It is understood that this is not meant as an exclusive option, and in the event of our being able to make a bona fide sale before we might be able to serve notice on you of our desire so to do, and in the event such sale be made to some other person or persons than those we may have come in contact with outside of your efforts, you will agree that there be no commission due you except and alone where you have participated.

"If the above is a true and correct understanding of our agreement, kindly sign a duplicate of this, signifying your acceptance.

"Very truly yours,

"La Belle Oil Company,

"[Signed] W. P. Cunningham, President.

"Acting Secretary:

"W. P. Thompson.

"[Corporate Seal of La Belle Oil Company.]

"Approved Jan. 15, 1912.

"[Signed] Ralph Arnold."

By proper allegation it is shown that plaintiff has fully complied with the terms of the foregoing instrument.

There was a demurrer to the amended complaint, which was overruled. Except for the mere formal parts, and the fact that it admits that the amount claimed to be due has not been paid, etc., defendant's answer denies each and every material allegation of the complaint. On the issues thus presented the case was tried by the court without a jury. At the close of plaintiff's case defendant moved for nonsuit, which motion was denied. Judgment went for plaintiff for the amount of his commission of 5 per cent. on the payments actually made to and received by the La Belle Oil Company prior to the commencement of the action, and also on the balance of $6,000, "which would have been paid prior to the trial if not impounded by the attachment herein." In short, the court found that all of the allegations of the complaint, as amended, as well as those of the supplemental complaint, were, and each of them was, true. The appeal is from the judgment so entered.

Finding No. 11 of the court reads as follows:

"The court finds that while it is true that there was no express resolution of the board of directors of said corporation defendant authorizing said written agreement with said plaintiff, there were no meetings of the board of directors of said corporation defendant from September 17, 1910, to March 13, 1912, and that during the whole of that period, and including the time when said agreement with said plaintiff was made, the directors of said defendant conducted the business of said defendant by informal discussion and conference between all of the directors except one of them to wit, F. E. Woodley, who did not give his attention to the affairs of said defendant corporation, and that at the time said agreement was made with said plaintiff and at all times thereafter all of said directors, excepting said Woodley, knew of and about said agreement, and that the same was made on behalf of said defendant corporation by its president and secretary, and discussed the same between them, and that said corporation did not, nor did any of its directors, at any time disavow said agreement or the execution thereof or dissent therefrom or claim to or notify said plaintiff that the same was not binding in any respect upon said defendant corporation; and the court further finds that said agreement with said plaintiff was specifically, expressly, and unanimously ratified in a written resolution of the board of directors of said defendant corporation at a regular meeting of said board held on June 12, 1912, at which a quorum of the directors of said corporation defendant was present and voting. The court finds that said agreement with said plaintiff or said plaintiff's agency was never terminated by notice or otherwise by said defendant."

It is urged by appellant here, as in the court below:

"(1) That the instrument quoted in full above and which is designated in the record as Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, was not proven; that without proper authorization said exhibit was not the act of defendant, and that no evidence was offered to show authorization; (2) that appellant was entitled to judgment at the close of plaintiff's case"

—in other words, errors of law occurring at the trial.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to show that Mr. Cunningham was president, or that Thompson was secretary, of the defendant company at the time of the execution and delivery by those parties of Plaintiff's Exhibit 1 to the plaintiff. The evidence on this point was by the plaintiff himself, which was that Mr. Cunningham, the president, and Mr. Thompson, the acting secretary of the La Belle Oil Company, signed Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 in his presence. Following this testimony the instrument was offered in evidence. To this defendant objected on the ground that it does not purport on its face to be authorized by the defendant corporation, and until the authorization be produced it is incompetent and immaterial. This objection was by the court overruled.

At the threshold of this matter it may be observed that the defendant's answer, so far as it refers to the allegations of the complaint, simply denies that the instrument in question was binding upon the defendant, for the reason that defendant never authorized its name to be signed or its seal attached thereto. By its answer defendant, in legal effect, admits the execution and delivery of the instrument to plaintiff by the officers of the defendant corporation, but denies that those officers had authority from it so to do.

[1] The evidence, as it stood at the time of the offer of the instrument in evidence, we think made a prima facie case. Indeed, the instrument, Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, might have been introduced without the introduction of any preliminary oral evidence. Had such been the situation, a prima facie case to that extent would have been established, for the reason that the document on its face purported to have been signed by the president and secretary, and had attached thereto and impressed thereon the seal of the defendant corporation. Such a showing was sufficient to shift the burden of proof on defendant. McKee v. Cunningham, 2 Cal. App. 684, 84 Pac. 260. For these reasons we think this ruling correct.

[2, 3] As supporting appellant's position, our attention is called to several decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, to wit, Curtin v. Salmon, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 345, 62 Pac. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132, Pacific Bank v. Stone, 121 Cal. 202, 53 Pac. 634, Blood v. La Serena, etc., Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252, Salfield v. Sutter, etc., Co., 94 Cal. 546, 29 Pac. 1105, and Alta Silver M. Co. v. Alta Placer M. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 Pac. 373, but we think none of these in point here. So far as applicable to the case at bar, section 1624 of the Civil Code reads as follows:

"The following contracts are invalid, unless the same, or some note or memorandum thereof, is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his agent: * * * 6. An agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for compensation or a commission."

We think no discussion is necessary to bring conviction that Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 is at least a "memorandum in writing" such as will bring it within the purview of this section. It seems to have been the uniform holding of the Supreme and appellate courts of this state that this section does not require any formal contract. All that is necessary is that the fact of employment be expressed in writing, signed by the party to be charged, or by his agent. And the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, as well as of this court, are in accord with the general rule on the subject in this country and England.

[4-6] The question, therefore, with which we are confronted here may be put as follows: "Is Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 the contract of the corporation?" We have already stated that plaintiff has established, prima facie, that it was. Supplementing this, a witness offered by defendant in its own behalf—Mr. W. P. Cunningham—in response to the very first question asked, testified that he was the president of the defendant corporation, and, in response to the second question, answered that he had been such "from its organization." In addition to this, we find in the record of the minutes of the board of directors of the defendant corporation, under date of June 12, 1915, that the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, that whereas Ralph Arnold has acted in the matter of sale and transfer of the La Belle Oil Company's property as special representative in a special agreement with W. P. Cunningham and W. P. Thompson, he should receive a commission of five per cent. (5%) on such deal as when paid to the La Belle Oil Company; therefore, be it resolved that the president and secretary are authorized to issue the company's check and pay the said Ralph Arnold five per cent. on such amount as the La Belle Oil Company received from the California Counties Oil Company as and when received."

The cases cited by appellant as supporting the contention that the exhibit in question is not the "contract" of the defendant corporation, as we have already intimated, are not in point, particularly in this: That when section 1624, supra, is construed with and in the light of sections 2309 and 2310 of the Civil Code—requiring an agent's authority to execute a contract in writing to be itself in writing—it does not, we think, apply to the executive officers of a corporation. "It has never been the practice to require powers of attorney to confer authority upon such agents. We think the statute was intended to apply to agents proper; that is, persons who were not officers of the corporation. The executive officer of a corporation is something more than an agent. He is the representative of the corporation itself. It was early decided that directors, though they are only agents of the corporation, are exempt from the rule which requires the authority of an agent to be in writing in order to vest him with power to execute a deed." McCartney v. Clover, etc., Co., 232 Fed. 697, 146 C. C. A. 623. In the case just cited it is shown that—"There are numerous authorities in which deeds and mortgages executed on behalf of corporations by executive officers without any resolution of the board, or any authority in writing, have been sustained."

From this we think it must be obvious that Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 was the act of the corporation, irrespective of the fact that the name of the secretary, actual or acting, might not have been appended, or the corporate seal attached thereto. We think, too, that even were the foregoing condition a prerequisite to the execution of an instrument such as is before us, a showing that a particular person, although not the regularly elected, qualified, or acting secretary, but appointed by the directors to act in the latter's absence, executed such instrument in such capacity, would be a sufficient compliance with the requirement referred to. Therefore, even although such prerequisite authorization be essential—which, as we have seen, is not—and it were held that such authority was not given in the first instance, still, under section 2310, supra, the resolution which we have quoted is, in our opinion, a complete ratification of the action of the corporation's officers, as already set forth, and as such there can be no question but that the exhibit before us is the "contract" or "memorandum in writing" conferring authority to plaintiff to act on behalf of the corporation for the purposes set forth therein.

[7] There is no attempt on the part of plaintiff to recover anything on the theory of quantum meruit or implied contract to pay for benefits. He is claiming under and by virtue of the specific terms and provisions of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1. By the terms of said exhibit it will be seen that plaintiff was authorized "to offer for sale * * * 80 acres, more or less, at $4,000 per acre, on such terms and conditions as we * * * may eventually agree upon." Plaintiff procured a purchaser, not at $4,000 per acre, or a total of $320,000, but for the total sum of $300,000, as will appear from Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2. This was accepted by the defendant corporation on April 9, 1912, which entered into the agreement as set forth in Plaintiff's Exhibit 2 with the purchaser therein mentioned, viz., the California Counties Oil Company, a corporation, under which agreement the latter went into possession and did work upon the property. When this was done, plaintiff was entitled to the compensation agreed upon, according to the terms of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1. Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328; Boland v. Ashurst Oil, etc., Co., 145 Cal. 405, 78 Pac. 871; Levy v. Wolf, 2 Cal. App. 491, 84 Pac. 313; Justy v. Erro, 16 Cal. App. 519, 117 Pac. 575; McMillan v. Beves, 147 Fed. 218, 77 C. C. A. 444.

It is contended by appellant that the said

California Counties Oil Company abandoned the latter contract. The evidence here does not support this contention. But it does appear that this contract or agreement was modified by mutual consent of the parties thereto on the 28th day of November, 1916, by which modification it is provided, among other things, that—

"It is hereby understood and agreed by all the parties hereto that the intent and purpose of this agreement is to cancel and set aside the agreement of April 9, 1912. * * * Should the said party of the second part [the California Counties Oil Company] fail to make the said payment * * * within ten days * * * then this agreement shall be of no effect, and shall immediately become null and void, and shall in no wise affect the said agreement of April 9, 1912."

By this modification the price originally agreed to be paid—$300,000—was reduced to and fixed at the sum of $187,294.19. Of this amount the purchaser, the California Counties Oil Company, had paid to the defendant corporation, before the commencement of this action, the whole thereof, except the sum of $6,000, and said defendant had paid the plaintiff a commission amounting to $4,752.20, or 5 per cent. on the sum of $95,045.47. Thereafter, and before the commencement of this action, the said California Counties Oil Company paid said defendant the further sum of $86,248.72, under and by virtue of the contract of April 9, 1912, as modified as aforesaid. No commission on this amount, or any portion of it, has ever been paid to plaintiff.

[8] It is maintained by appellant that respondent was not entitled to commission on payments made to it under the said modification of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2, because "there is absolutely no testimony to show that respondent had anything to do with the execution of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 3 [the modification agreement]." There is no merit in this contention. There is no reason shown why respondent should have had anything to do with it. As we have already seen, he was entitled to his compensation under Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, and according to the terms thereof. No subsequent agreement or modification of the original agreement between the vendee and the vendor therein could affect plaintiff's rights. Were it otherwise, the bars would be all down, and every agent who had rendered valuable service might by such legerdemain as suggested here, be defrauded, not only out of a portion but out of the whole of the compensation agreed to be paid to him for procuring a purchaser of property.

[9] By the terms of Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1 plaintiff was to receive his said commission "in the manner as and when paid to us"—defendant. This is but another way of saying:

"You are not to receive your 5 per cent. on the whole of the purchase price when the deal is closed, but as fast as the purchaser pays in to us we will deduct the commission from such payment and remit to you."

Indeed, this is all plaintiff contends for. The construction placed upon this phrase by defendant evidently is that in reality plaintiff was entitled to nothing until the full purchase price was paid, but that, notwithstanding this, the defendant had paid plaintiff the sum of $4,752.20, although under no legal obligation so to do. With the facts before us we are unable to accede to any such construction. It is conceded by defendant that the sum of $86,248.72 has actually been paid to it on account of the sale made originally to the purchaser, who was brought to it by plaintiff, and that it has paid plaintiff no commission thereon. He is entitled to it, as found by the learned trial judge.

[10, 11] It is next urged by appellant that—

"The judgment of the lower court includes commission on the sum of $6,000 payments due, but not yet made under Exhibit 3. To reiterate, respondent's contract calls for commissions only 'in the manner as and when' payments are received by appellant. It is but idle speculation to say that the purchaser is able, willing, and ready to pay. It may or may not become insolvent before it does so. The fact is that no payment has been made, and commission dependent thereon is not due. The judgment of the lower court must be modified at least in respect to this item."

In answer to this respondent claims that—

Said $6,000 became payable prior to the trial, "it being stipulated at the trial that the same would have been paid had it not been impounded by the attachment of the plaintiff herein. The matter is alleged in the supplemental complaint printed on pages 15 and 16 of the supplement to appellant's opening brief. It was the understanding of the trial court and of ourselves that the stipulation of the defendant was that judgment might pass for the amount of the commission on this sum of $6,000 as well as on the other amounts already paid if the plaintiff was entitled to judgment at all, and we do not understand why counsel raises this question now."

This statement of counsel for respondent is neither answered nor denied. Such being the case, coupled with the fact that the court actually found for the plaintiff on this item, as already seen, it will be assumed that appellant concedes the truth of such statement, and that the finding was proper. Colkins v. Doolittle, 188 Pac. 601; Welch v. Alcott, 198 Pac. 626.

No other point raised by appellant need be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

SCHWARZ v. BOHLE et ux. (Civ. 3328.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 11, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 10, 1920.)

1. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 688—Judgment in action to quiet title against administrator held res judicata as to heirs.

Judgment in a former action to quiet title, brought by plaintiff against his deceased wife's administrator, was binding on her estate and conclusive against deceased's daughter and heir and the daughter's husband, and was res judicata as to them.

2. Vendor and purchaser $\hookrightarrow$ 13—Disclaimer by party not having interest no consideration for oral promise to deed land.

Where, in a husband's action against his deceased wife's estate to quiet title, it was decreed that land was community property, so that deceased's daughter had no interest in it, her disclaimer of interest in such action could furnish no consideration for plaintiff's oral promise to deed her the premises upon demand.

3. Frauds, statute of $\hookrightarrow$ 71—Oral promise to deed land void, in absence of fraudulent conduct.

An oral promise to deed land is void under the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624), in the absence of such fraudulent conduct as would take the case out of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Frank R. Schwarz against Frederick H. Bohle and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Theodore L. Breslauer, of San Francisco (Harold C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

McPike & Murray, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to recover possession of the premises involved in it from the defendants, who were alleged to be tenants of the plaintiff and to have failed to pay their rent, and also failed and refused to surrender possession of the premises to the plaintiff as the owner thereof. The answer of the defendants denied their relation as tenants of the plaintiff and denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the premises. As a further answer to the plaintiff's complaint the defendants alleged that one Julia Schwarz, deceased, the wife of the plaintiff, and the mother of the defendant Eva Anna Bohle, was in her lifetime the owner of the premises in question; that she died intestate, and that after her death the plaintiff in this action represented to the said defendant Eva Anna Bohle that if she would disclaim to him all interest in the property he would clear the title, and would thereafter on demand grant said premises to said Eva Anna Bohle; and that relying on such representations she disclaimed all her right, title, and interest in said property to said plaintiff, but that said plaintiff upon her demand has refused to convey said property to her; wherefore she prays that she be adjudged the owner of said property, and that the plaintiff be required to deed the same to her.

Upon the trial of the cause the plaintiff testified that the property in question was purchased by himself and his said wife, Julia Schwarz, as community property; that upon her death an administrator was appointed of her estate; that the plaintiff thereupon commenced an action against said administrator and also against the two children of himself and his deceased wife, of whom Eva Bohle was one, to quiet title to the premises, alleging the same to have been community property; and that he since his wife's death was the sole and absolute owner thereof. The administrator filed a general denial in said action; the other two defendants filed disclaimers therein. Upon the trial of that action the plaintiff recovered judgment decreeing him to be the sole owner of the property. The judgment roll in that case was then introduced in evidence in this case, and the plaintiff rested. Thereupon the defendants undertook to offer evidence in support of the affirmative averments of their answer to the effect that the plaintiff had orally promised the defendant herein, Eva Anna Bohle, that if she would give him a disclaimer in the former suit he would convey the premises to her upon demand. The court refused to permit the defendants to make this proof upon the two grounds that, if it was offered as an attack upon the former judgment, it was inadmissible, since that judgment was res adjudicata between the parties to this action; and if, on the other hand, it was offered by the defendant in an effort to establish an oral trust in the plaintiff to convey the premises to the said defendant Eva Anna Bohle, their pleadings were wholly insufficient to permit oral proof of such trust. The court thereupon rendered its judgment in the plaintiff's favor, and from such judgment the defendants prosecute this appeal.

[1] We are satisfied that the trial court committed no error in its aforesaid rulings upon the trial of this cause. The judgment entered in the former action to quiet title against the administrator of the estate of Julia Schwarz, deceased, was, of course, binding upon her estate, and would have been binding and conclusive as against the heirs of said deceased, even if they had not been parties to and have filed disclaimers in said action. Cunningham v. Ashley, 45 Cal. 485; McCaughey v. Lyall, 152 Cal. 615, 93 Pac. 681. It would therefore have been res adjudicata against these defendants if they had undertaken in this action to attack the same.

But the defendants, by their affirmative pleading in this case, make no attack upon said judgment, and in fact in their briefs herein expressly disclaim any intent to assail said judgment. The defendants' sole contention, as disclosed by their said pleading, is that the plaintiff received from Eva Anna Bohle a disclaimer of any interest in said premises derived from her deceased mother upon his oral promise to thereafter deed said premises to her, and that he has refused to make said deed. There are no averments of actual fraud in this pleading, nor is there the slightest attempt to bring this case as to its pleadings within the case of Brisson v. Brisson, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, and the later cases approving its doctrine as to constructive fraud. The utmost that can be said of the defendants' case, as presented both in their said pleading and in their proposed proofs, is that they are attempting to enforce an oral agreement to convey real estate.

[2, 3] There are several insuperable obstacles in the way of the defendants' success. The judgment in the former case decreed that the property in question in both cases was the community property of the plaintiff and his deceased wife, and hence passed to him solely and absolutely upon her death. The defendants, as we have seen, are bound by that judgment, and in fact do not assail it. It was thus conclusively determined that the defendant herein Eva Anna Bohle never had any interest whatever in said property. Her disclaimer, therefore, could furnish no consideration for the plaintiff's oral promise to deed her the premises upon demand, and it was therefore such a promise which, even if made, equity would not enforce. The provisions of section 1624 of the Civil Code embracing the statute of frauds is another insurmountable barrier to the defendants' recovery in this action, in the absence of those elements of fraudulent conduct on the plaintiff's part taking the case outside of the requirements of said statute. The trial court properly ruled that the defendants had presented no such case in their pleadings as would permit them to make their proffered proofs.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITE. (Cr. 494.)(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 8, 1920.)1. Criminal law — 412(3)—Statements of prisoners in cell admissible.

Statements voluntarily made by prisoners in a cell indicative of a purpose on the part of both to fabricate a defense to the charge were admissible in evidence.

2. Criminal law — 1169(1)—Admission of evidence harmless.

Where the evidence conclusively shows that defendants committed the offense charged, judgment of conviction will not be reversed on account of erroneous admission of evidence.

3. Indictment and information — 161(6)—Court could correct name of prosecutrix after jury was drawn.

Where information for rape through clerical error designated prosecutrix as "Carlson" instead of "Larsen," the court could, after the completion of the jury, under its inherent powers or under Penal Code, § 1008, permit the name to be changed.

4. Criminal law — 1032(1)—Objection to change in information waived by failure to object.

Where defendant by his silence acquiesced in suggestion of state's attorney of a clerical error in the information in the name of the prosecutrix, and court changed the name, he will not be heard to complain thereof on appeal.

5. Criminal law — 1141(1)—Presumptions in favor of regularity of proceedings below.

On appeal the presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings in the lower court.

6. Criminal law — 1186(4)—Erroneous change in information not reversible error.

If it was error for the court to change the name of the prosecutrix in the information after the jury was complete, conviction will not be reversed where there was no prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Raymond White was convicted of rape, and from the judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1, 2] Appellant was convicted of the crime of rape, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. He was jointly charged with one Willard Carlson, but he was tried separately. The prosecutrix was 15 years of age, and the evidence shows quite conclusively that she was the victim of a brutal assault committed by the defendants acting in concert. Indeed, it would have been surprising if the jury had failed to convict appellant. We make these observations to indicate in what light we should view the two alleged errors upon which appellant relies for a reversal. The first of these relates to the introduction in evidence of a conversation between the two defendants while they were confined in jail before the trial. The testimony was given by a constable, who was secreted in one of the cells near those occupied by White and Carlson. Their statements were purely voluntary, and they were indicative of a purpose on the part of both defendants to fabricate a defense to the charge. At least the statements were capable of such construction, and it was entirely proper to submit them to the jurors for their consideration. The statements are too indecent for publication, but it is sufficient to say that they agreed as to what their testimony should be. That they should consider it necessary to make such agreement affords some evidence of a guilty mind. Innocent men might inquire of each other as to their recollection of an event or their knowledge of an alleged offense, but they are not at all likely to plunge immediately into a proposal and acceptance of a certain definite statement to be made by each in answer to a criminal charge. We are entirely satisfied that it was a proper circumstance for the jury to consider, but at any rate, under the rule that now prevails in this state, if the ruling was erroneous, it should not operate to overthrow the verdict.

[3-5] The other objection is probably worthy of more serious consideration. As to it the only record is contained in the following minutes of the clerk:

"The jury being now complete, * * * the clerk thereupon read the information to the jury and stated defendant's plea of not guilty. Thereupon the district attorney requested and was granted permission of the court to amend the information on its face by striking out the word 'Carlson' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'Larsen.'"

In reference to this matter, appellant asseverates that he—

"was denied the right of trial by jury. The jury that returned the verdict was never impaneled or sworn to try him on the charge upon which he was convicted. At the time the jury that convicted him was sworn, the charge upon which he was convicted had not been filed against him. He never had an opportunity to challenge peremptorily or for any cause any of the jurors. In short, this was the most irregular trial which, in my opinion, has ever been submitted for review."

This is assuredly quite a picturesque and impressive impeachment of the district attorney and the trial judge, but it is entirely unwarranted by the facts in the cause. We are justified in representing the situation as follows: Appellant was regularly and properly charged by an information with said crime committed June 30, 1919, in said county of Mendocino, against the person of Jennie Carlson. He was arraigned and pleaded not guilty, and the case was set for trial. A jury was impaneled according to law, and then the district attorney ascertained that a clerical mistake had been made in stating the name of the prosecutrix, that her real name was "Jennie Larsen," and not "Carlson," as it appeared, and asked the court's permission to make the change. To this request no objection was made by appellant, and by his silence he acquiesced in the suggestion. Thereupon the court granted permission to have the mistake thus corrected. This was done, and the cause proceeded to trial without any objection or suggestion that a different offense had been charged by changing the name of the prosecutrix; it being understood by all parties that only one offense was claimed by the district attorney, and that the amendment was sought for the reason already stated. The trial disclosed the name of the prosecuting witness to be Jennie Larsen, and it was shown very clearly that at the time and place and in the manner alleged in the information said offense was committed against her. He was convicted, and for the first time on appeal, he makes the point that another offense was charged by the amendment, and that for such offense he was never arraigned and was not legally put upon trial. Under such circumstances, can he successfully urge such objection? To ask the question is to answer it. The court had the right to permit the error to be corrected, it was plainly its duty to do so, and such action would not have been subject to objection, if any had been made. But, as we have seen, appellant acquiesced in the course that was pursued, and that affords an additional reason why he should not now be heard to complain. It is true that we have stated the case more fully than the record discloses, but as to this point we simply have the minutes of the clerk; they do not purport, nor are they expected, to contain the whole record, and the presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the proceedings. In the absence of any showing to the contrary we have a right to assume, therefore, what is altogether probable, namely, that the change was made for the reason suggested.

As to another arraignment and another plea, they were, of course, not called for, since but one offense was charged, and as to that the defendant was allowed every right which the law provides. It would have been an idle and foolish thing to repeat the arraignment and to reimpanel the jury simply because the court had permitted an amendment to the information for the purpose of properly identifying and describing the offense that was committed by the appellant.

We may add that the court would have inherent power to permit such a clerical mistake to be corrected, but section 1008 of the Penal Code expressly authorized amendments as follows:

"An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant."

[6] Of course, there was no prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant caused by the course herein pursued. Indeed, if we may assume that the proceedings were irregular, then no substantial wrong has been committed, and no injustice has been suffered. In this connection, the case of People v. Tomskey, 20 Cal. App. 672, 130 Pac. 184, may be read with interest and profit. It is ample authority to justify the rejection of appellant's contentions as opposed to the established principles of modern criminal procedure.

We think the judgment and order should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

1. Evidence $\S$ 347—Foreign judgment may be proved by authenticated copy.

A foreign judgment may be proved by an authenticated copy of the judgment alone, without the judgment roll.

2. Evidence $\S$ 383(5)—Certificate attached to judgment established general jurisdiction of foreign court.

Certificate attached to judgment of foreign court, stating that such court was a court of record having a seal, was sufficient to establish, prima facie, that the foreign court was a court of general jurisdiction.

3. Evidence $\S$ 80(1)—Foreign laws presumed same as those of forum.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is presumed that the law of a foreign state as to the requirement of notice of time of trial is the same as the law of the forum.

4. Judgment $\S$ 113—Notice of trial to defaulting defendant not necessary.

5. Judgment ~~504~~(1)—Based on trial without notice erroneous, but not void.

A trial and judgment, given without notice of date of trial required by Code Civ. Proc. § 594, is merely erroneous, and is not in excess of the court's jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by John H. Uplinger against Henry H. Yonkin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover judgment for money due upon a judgment entered against the defendant in the Circuit Court of De Kalb County, Ill. Judgment was entered herein against the defendant, who now appeals therefrom. Appellant presents three points, on which he claims that this judgment should be reversed.

[1] First point: That the Illinois judgment has not been proved as required by law, in this, that an authenticated copy of the judgment alone was received in evidence, without the judgment roll. This question has been determined adversely to appellant's contention in McHatton v. Rhodes, 143 Cal. 275, 76 Pac. 1036, 101 Am. St. Rep. 125. An issue presented in that case depended upon the validity of a judgment of a circuit court, a court of general jurisdiction in the state of Missouri. An authenticated copy of the Missouri judgment was admitted in evidence, without the judgment roll. The judgment of the superior court was affirmed, notwithstanding that the decision therein contained was clearly wrong unless supported by the evidence of the foreign judgment.

[2] Second point: That the judgment sued on is invalid as the basis of a recovery thereon in California, inasmuch as the judgment itself does not show that personal service of the summons in said action was had upon the defendant in the state of Illinois and within the jurisdiction of the court rendering said judgment, and there is not any other proof, by way of record or otherwise, offered in support of such jurisdiction. The judgment, as shown by the copy thereof, duly certified under seal of court and authenticated, states that—

"It appearing to the court that due personal service of process of summons issued in said cause has been had on the defendant for at least 10 days before the first day of this term, and he, being now here three times solemnly called in open court, comes not, nor does any person for him, but herein he makes default, which is on motion of plaintiff's attorney ordered to be taken, and the same is hereby entered of record."

Thereupon, it is stated, evidence was received, the damages were assessed, and recovery had in the sum specified. The certificate recites that said court is a court of record, having a seal. This is sufficient to establish, prima facie, that it is a court of general jurisdiction. In McHatton v. Rhodes, supra, the Missouri judgment was a judgment determining adversely to one Hattie Meagher her claim of title to certain real property. The recitals contained in the judgment were to the effect that she had been duly notified by publication. The Supreme Court of California held that in that case, "the court being of general jurisdiction, all presumptions are that it had jurisdiction, and that the effect of the recital in the judgment is that the notice or summons was properly published. It is declared in the Constitution of the United States that full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state." The court referred to section 1963, subd. 16, Code Civ. Proc., and after some further discussion, said:

"In all cases where a judgment is collaterally attacked we must presume, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, that they were properly brought in. The presumption is the same where service has been made by publication as where personal service has been had."

[3-5] Third point: That the record does not show that any notice of the time of the hearing of said action was ever served upon or had by the defendant, or served upon or had by any attorney for defendant, and no evidence other than the so-called judgment was offered in that regard. This contention is based upon the provisions of section 594, Code of Civil Procedure of California, and the presumption (in the absence of other evidence) that the law of Illinois as to the requirement of notice of the time of trial, is the same as the law of California. But the notice provided for need not be given to a defaulting defendant. And even where the requirements of the section are applicable, a trial and judgment given without such notice is merely erroneous, and is not in excess of the court's jurisdiction; such, at least, is our inference from the only decision which seems to have touched the question. For in that decision (Estate of Dean, 149 Cal. 492, 87 Pac. 13) the court very carefully limited to cases of direct appeal its declaration that a judgment rendered in disregard of that section is erroneous and should be reversed.

We are of the opinion that the court did not err in receiving the evidence to which reference has been made, or in rendering Judgment against appellant on the facts as thus proved.

The judgment is affirmed.

RAMISH v. REICHENBACH et al.
(Civ. 3361.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 7, 1920.)

Appeal and error — 1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Finding of fact on conflicting substantial evidence is conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Adolph Ramish against Max Reichenbach and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edward F. Wehrle, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Alfred H. McAdoo and David E. Bergman, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered against them as involuntary trustees on plaintiff's complaint for rent of premises occupied by defendants in the double capacity as trustees for creditors and assignees of the insolvent under an assignment made for the benefit of all creditors of the insolvent other than plaintiff. The controversy arises through the fact that after the defendants were appointed trustees for the creditors a written agreement was made between them and plaintiff whereby plaintiff agreed to permit defendants to continue the occupation of the premises theretofore leased to the insolvent, and the defendants promised to pay to plaintiff the back rentals then due out of the first profits of the business. By the pleadings it is admitted that defendants also agreed to pay the expenses of conducting or operating the business, including the payment of the monthly rental and water charges for the premises occupied, before distributing or paying to the other creditors anything upon the indebtedness due them. During the course of their conduct of the business the defendants paid certain sums to an agent of one of the creditors and other sums to the attorney for the creditors, leaving in their possession insufficient moneys to meet the payment for the current rental admitted to be due to plaintiff. Upon the trial it was contended on the part of plaintiff that the moneys so paid out were for services rendered to the creditors, and defendants claimed that such payments were necessary and proper expenses of conducting and operating the business by the trustees. Plaintiff also asked for an accounting upon the theory that, though he was not a party to the original assignment for the benefit of creditors, the defendants by their special agreement with him became involuntary trustees for his benefit. The trial court found that the defendants during their conduct of the business received sufficient moneys to have enabled them under the terms of their agreement with plaintiff to pay him the amount claimed to be due as rental for the premises, but that the defendants used and disposed of such moneys, not in payment of the necessary expenses of conducting and operating the business, to an extent and in an amount sufficient to have paid plaintiff the amount due him.

The whole argument of appellants on this appeal resolves itself into an attack upon this finding as not supported by the evidence. There was substantial evidence tending to prove that one Brown, to whom payments were made for services rendered in checking up the cash and doing certain clerical work, was engaged by one of the creditors, and not by the trustees; also that such services were for the benefit of the creditors charged and were not necessary for the operation of the business under the trustees. There was also evidence that the attorney to whom other payments were made was employed by the creditors to prepare the original trust agreement and assignment, that he was not employed by either of the trustees, and that he rendered little, if any, legal services to them directly. The evidence on the part of appellants tending to show that some of these services were rendered for and at the request of the trustees merely presents a conflict upon which the trial court was required to find. The finding so made, being based upon conflicting evidence, is conclusive upon this appeal, and for these reasons the judgment is affirmed.

BOLAND v. SMITH. (Civ. 3095.)(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1920.)1. Evidence ⇨442(6)—As to time of delivery of automobile sold not inadmissible as varying contract.

In buyer's action to rescind purchase of automobile, testimony as to subsequent conversations between parties as to when car would be delivered held competent to explain conditions, no date of delivery having been fixed in the written contract, and nothing shown therein as to whether first shipment had been ordered or would be made.

2. Sales ⇨81(1)—Contract for sale of automobile called for delivery in reasonable time.

Under a contract for sale of an automobile, delivery to be made "on or about out of first shipment of" the model, the obligation of the sellers was to have delivery made within a reasonable time, depending on conditions within knowledge of the sellers.

3. Sales ⇨130(3)—Evidence held to justify conclusion delay in delivery unreasonable.

In action to rescind purchase of automobile, evidence held to justify conclusion that delay in delivery was unreasonable.

4. Appeal and error ⇨907(2)—Presumption ruling of trial court supported by evidence.

Where the appellate court can surmise that such a showing has been made as would have justified a ruling as expressed by the trial court, and the evidence is not before the appellate court, it must presume that the condition of the case in its evidence was such as to support the ruling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by William P. Boland against Stanley W. Smith, individually and as executor of C. F. Smith, deceased. From judgment for plaintiff rescinding contract for purchase of an automobile, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leo V. Youngworth and Harry J. McClean, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to enforce rescission of a contract for the purchase of an automobile. Judgment was awarded in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and defendants appeal. (After judgment there was a substitution of parties plaintiff by reason of an assignment made by plaintiff Carlin G. Smith to Boland.)

On June 12, 1912, plaintiff negotiated with defendant, Stanley W. Smith, and C. F. Smith, since deceased, for the purchase of an automobile, and on that date paid a deposit of $500. A written contract in the form of a memorandum order was drawn up and signed by the purchaser and the vendors. The automobile was not at the time in the hands of the vendors ready for delivery, but was to be shipped from the factory at an Eastern point, and the written contract provided that the delivery was to be made "on or about out of first shipment of this model." The signature of the plaintiff first appeared attached to the order, and over the signature of the vendors was the following clause:

"We agree to fulfill all the terms and conditions of this order, subject to delay resulting from fires, strikes, action of elements, and other circumstances beyond our control."

No delivery of the car having been made, on the 25th of November, 1912, the plaintiff served a written notice of rescission upon the vendors and demanded the return to him of the $500 deposited. The court, in its findings of fact, recited that defendants had represented to plaintiff that they had several shipments of models of the kind of car desired coming, and that the first shipment would reach Los Angeles on or about the 1st day of July; that the defendants failed to make delivery of the car on July 1st, but stated to plaintiff that shipment had been delayed and that the car would be shortly delivered, and at various times between July 1 and October 17, 1912, the vendors represented and stated that shipment of said car would shortly be made; that on the 17th day of October the vendors specifically promised and agreed to make delivery of the car not later than three weeks from that date, to wit, not later than November 17, 1912; that the vendors received a shipment of the model of the car contracted to be delivered on or about the 25th day of December, and on the 26th of that month notified the plaintiff of the receipt of the car and offered to make delivery thereof. The court further found:

"That defendants have wholly refused and failed to make delivery of any car under the terms of their contract with the plaintiff within a reasonable time, and have failed and refused to return to plaintiff the sum of $500."

One of the contentions of the appellants here is that the court erred in admitting the oral testimony of the plaintiff touching the time that it was understood the automobile would be delivered; the claim being that the effect of such testimony was to vary the terms of the written contract. The testimony referred to was given by the plaintiff, and, as set forth in the bill of exceptions, is as follows:

"I had a conversation at the time the contract was made regarding the time of delivery. Mr. Smith said he would deliver the car between the 1st and 15th of July, that year. I had a further conversation with Mr. Smith, of Smith Bros., in August of 1912. I called on Mr. Smith and asked him when I was to get my car; and he said, 'We expect it any day.' I went in his place every once in a while to find out when he was to make delivery. On August 17th he called at my office to collect a bill for repairs. I said, 'When am I going to get my car?' He said, 'You will get your car within two weeks.' I called in two men, Mr. Sadler, who was in my office, and Mr. Rending, and asked them to listen to the conversation. I said, 'Clarence, you promised me delivery within two weeks.' He said, 'You will get your car within two weeks.' I said, 'I will give you three weeks; if I don't get my car within three weeks, I want my money.' He said, 'You will have the car or your money,' and he left and walked out. I made a memoranda of that conversation on the contract that he had signed and given to me. The car was not delivered on November 7th. I signed a notice of rescission, which was served on Mr. Smith."

Section 1860, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"For the proper construction of an instrument, the circumstances under which it was made, including the situation of the subject of the instrument, and of the parties to it, may also be shown, so that the judge be placed in the position of those whose language he is to interpret."

[1-3] We think that the testimony was competent to explain the conditions, in view of the fact that no date of delivery was fixed in the written contract and nothing therein was shown as to whether the shipment of automobiles had already been ordered or as to when such shipment would be made. In our opinion, under the terms of the contract, it should be said that the obligation of the vendors was to have delivery made of the car within a reasonable time. What would amount to a reasonable time for shipment from the East and receipt in Los Angeles would depend upon conditions within the knowledge of the vendors, and for that reason we think it was proper for the court to receive testimony touching the representations and statements made by the vendors on the subject of delivery. While in the plaintiff's testimony conversations were shown between the plaintiff and one of the vendors, which conversations occurred subsequent to the making of the contract, those conversations were not relied upon by the trial judge as fixing a new and definite date upon which the automobile was agreed to be delivered, but only as showing the continuing conditions as to the nondelivery and the explanations made by the vendors in attempted excuse of the same, all of which was competent as going to the question as to whether at the time the plaintiff gave notice of rescission there had been an unreasonable delay on the part of the vendors in the delivery of the automobile. The court directly determined that the delay was unreasonable, and, upon the evidence shown, we think that that conclusion was justified.

A second contention of the appellants relates to the matter of another transaction had between the parties prior to the making of the particular contract here involved. In a cross-complaint defendants alleged facts concerning the prior transaction under which it seems the plaintiff had first bargained for a different automobile, which he received, and that he later returned the automobile, with the consent of the defendants, and forfeited some money which he had paid thereon. In the findings of the trial court it is determined that the transaction last referred to was distinct and separate from that sued upon by the plaintiff, and that the rescission of the former contract was not, as defendant asserted, a part of the consideration for the making of the contract to enforce rescission of which this action was brought. Appellants contend that the court refused to admit testimony offered by them in support of matters contained in the cross-complaint. We are unable to determine from the bill of exceptions as to what testimony was offered to that point. The bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all of the testimony heard at the trial. As to the offered testimony we find in the record, among the specifications, this statement:

"In reply to defendants' offer to prove the facts of the prior transaction as pleaded in the cross-complaint the court said: 'I just want the records to show that you started to prove other considerations for this contract not stated therein relative to the matter pleaded in the cross-complaint, and the court refused to hear it on the ground that as the evidence stands at this time you are not entitled to introduce any evidence whatever regarding the former transaction between these parties; in other words, that the court confines you to mutual obligations created by the written contract pleaded by you on the ordering of this car.'"

[4] As to how the evidence stood, as the court phrased it, at the time the judge made that statement, we are not enlightened. We can surmise that such a showing had been made as would have justified the ruling as expressed by the judge, and, that being true, we must presume that the condition of the case in its evidence was such as to support the ruling.

No other points are presented which require consideration or discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

CREDIT GUIDE CO. v. FIDELITY STORAGE & MOVING CO. (Civ. 2806.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 11, 1920.)

Limitation of actions §66(8)—Action against bailee for property accrues on demand.

Where property came into possession of defendant warehouseman in 1912, and was demanded during the two next following years, action to recover it, commenced in 1917, was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, the three-year statute.

Action by the Credit Guide Company against the Fidelity Storage & Moving Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frederick A. Preston, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

D. Joseph Coyne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover possession of certain described personal property or the value thereof. Judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

In the answer it was alleged that the action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which an action of this character must be commenced within three years from the time when the cause of action accrued. The property in question belonged to plaintiff's assignor, Sarah B. Clark, and came into the possession of the defendant in December, 1912, or January, 1913. Mrs. Clark testified as follows:

"I have requested and demanded the return of the goods which were missing on a number of occasions, as follows: At Los Angeles, one or two times at defendant's place of business, the loss of the box having been discovered in April 1913. I demanded the same several months later. I was at that time advised that they could not locate the box or the contents, but that they said that they would continue their efforts. Several times after the occasion mentioned I took up the matter with the company, and was again advised that they were still searching for the chest containing the articles mentioned, but had not yet been successful."

In connection with the testimony of Mrs. Clark, it appears that her demand had been made and was being insisted upon by her as early as January, 1914. On the 8th of that month defendant sent her a letter, stating that defendant was endeavoring to find the chest in which said goods were said to be contained, and asked her for a description of the chest and contents. On the 29th of the same month they sent her a second letter, acknowledging receipt of a letter from her, of date January 19th, giving the contents of the chest, and stating that they were moving the contents of their old warehouse into their new one, "we are in hopes to find your chest in this way; if we do not, we will endeavor to make a settlement with you." This is practically all of the evidence bearing upon the time when the demand was made and when the claimant's right of action accrued. The action was not commenced until April 24, 1917. On these facts it seems to be established without any doubt that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the court's finding that the cause of action is not barred by the provisions of the third subdivision of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Vendor and purchaser §185 — Inexcusable failure to make payment under contract terminates it.

When in a contract for the sale of land time is made of the essence, an inexcusable failure on the part of holder of option to make a payment when the same should be paid according to the terms of the contract terminates his rights under the option, and makes it impossible for him to enforce the same in the absence of a waiver on the part of the other party.

2. Quieting title §30(3)—Former owner of land held not necessary party.

Where an owner of land gave a third party an option to purchase it upon making certain payments, and such third person failed to make the payment at the time stipulated, whereupon the owner declared a forfeiture of the contract, and subsequently sold the land to plaintiff, in a suit by plaintiff to quiet title brought against the third party, the former owner was not a necessary party.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This action was commenced by plaintiff to quiet his title to a certain tract of land in the county of San Joaquin, which land he purchased from one J. A. Coley on the 27th day of June, 1917.

On May 13, 1914, an agreement was entered into between the said J. A. Coley and defendant, Mary R. Schuyler, by which Coley agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy the said land for the purchase price of $53,000. The agreement acknowledges the receipt of $18,000, being the value placed on certain lots in Oakland, and the balance of the purchase price, amounting to $35,000, to be paid before July 1, 1919, together with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum on all deferred payments, interest to be paid annually. The agreement provides that, in consideration of the defendant being given possession of the premises, she agrees to pay all taxes which may be levied or assessed on the premises, that by the terms of the contract it was expressly provided that time was of the essence thereof, and that in the event of the failure of said Mary R. Schuyler to make any payment at the time the same became due, or within 30 days thereafter, the contract should become null and void, and the said Mary R. Schuyler should forfeit all right thereto and to all moneys theretofore paid on account of the said agreement.

The defendant failed to make the payments as provided by the contract, and as to her failure in this regard the court found:

"That subsequent to the execution of said contract said defendant, Mary R. Schuyler, made certain payments thereunder aggregating the sum of $1,927.46 and no more, and all of such sum was paid before the 1st day of January, 1916; * * * that said Mary R. Schuyler failed, neglected, and refused to pay the interest on the purchase price mentioned in said contract or any part thereof as the same became due or otherwise, and also failed, neglected, and refused to pay the taxes levied upon said premises subsequent to the first installment of taxes for the year 1915; that said J. A. Coley made frequent demands upon said Mary R. Schuyler for the payment of the interest and taxes due from her under said contract prior to August 16, 1916; that on the date last mentioned said J. A. Coley notified said Mary R. Schuyler in writing that she was in default and had been in default for more than 30 days in the payments then due and payable under the terms of said contract, and that if she should fail for 10 days thereafter to perform said contract and make the payments then due thereunder that she would forfeit her rights under said contract; that said Mary R. Schuyler continued to fail and neglect to make payment of the interest and taxes then due and payable from her under said contract, and has never made nor tendered any amount whatever to apply on said contract since the 16th day of August, 1916."

[1] The law is settled in this state that, when in a contract for the sale of land time is made of the essence of the contract, an inexcusable failure on the part of the holder of the option to make a payment when the same should be paid according to the terms of the contract terminates his rights under the option, and makes it impossible for him to enforce the same, in the absence of a waiver on the part of the other party (Champion G. Min. Co. v. Champion Mines, 164 Cal. 205, 128 Pac. 315; Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17), and no notice is required to terminate the defendant's rights under the contract (Northern Assurance Co. v. Stout, 16 Cal. App. 548, 554, 117 Pac. 617; Newhall Land & Farming Co. v. Burns, 31 Cal. App. 549, 553, 161 Pac. 14; Commercial Bank v. Weldon, 148 Cal. 601, 84 Pac. 171). In the case of Schwerin Estate Realty Co. v. Slye, 173 Cal. 170, 159 Pac. 420, the plaintiff sued to quiet title to certain land, and the defendants answered, setting up certain contracts for the purchase and sale of the property upon which they were in default. The court, in passing upon the case, says:

"We cannot escape from the conclusion that by failing to prove their readiness, ability, and willingness to perform their part of the contract within the time limited therein the defendants utterly failed to establish their right to any relief. * * * Under the terms of the contract no affirmative act on the part of the vendor was necessary to place the vendees in default. It expressly made failure to comply with its terms within the time limited 'by the parties of the second part' (Slye and Condon) an automatic termination of all of the vendor's obligations in law and equity. Of this agreement it may be said, just as Mr. Justice Henshaw said in Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1-16 (69 Am. St. Rep. 17, 43 L. R. A. 199, 55 Pac. 713): 'In the case at bar the payment of the final amount under the contract, at the time and in the manner agreed upon, was a condition precedent to the right of the vendee to demand a conveyance. Upon his failure to make payment the vendee committed a breach and no affirmative act upon the part of the vendor was necessary to bring about this result.'"

[2] The defendant claims that J. A. Coley was a necessary party to the action, and in the absence of said Coley as a party the contract was a sufficient and complete answer to plaintiff's complaint. We think the cases above cited are a sufficient answer to this contention. The default of defendant in making the payments as called for by the said contract operated ipso facto as a forfeiture of the same and of the rights of the vendee thereunder. Northern Assurance Co. v. Stout, 16 Cal. App. 548, 117 Pac. 617; Newhall Land & Farming Co. v. Burns, 31 Cal. App. 549, 161 Pac. 14. The contract by reason of the said default of defendant had been forfeited and had ceased to exist at the time Coley conveyed the property to the plaintiff, and under these circumstances we do not consider that said Coley was a necessary, or even a proper, party to the action.

It is argued that there was a waiver of the strict performance of the terms of the contract by Coley as to the payments of interest and taxes. This contention of the defendant cannot be sustained. The trial court, upon conflicting evidence, found that the defendant was not excused from making the said payments as the same became due by any act or conduct on the part of said J. A. Coley, and that no act or conduct on his part justified her in failing to perform her part of the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

DUNNING BROS. CO. v. JOHNSON.
(Civ. 2164.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1920.)

Judgment ¶423—Equity may correct mutual mistake in description of property in pleadings and judgment.

Where, in a suit to quiet title as against a tax deed, the land involved has been both in the pleadings and the judgment erroneously through mutual mistake described as being in range "J," instead of range "I," a court of equity has power to correct the mistake.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Suit by the Dunning Brothers Company against Waldo S. Johnson to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Ebert and W. E. Davies, both of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

NICOL, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Yuba county quieting title of plaintiff to three lots in the city of Marysville and correcting a mistake in the description of the said lots as contained in a judgment entered in the case of John Martin v. Chester A. Smith et al.

On December 4, 1914, the defendant Waldo S. Johnson purchased, at a tax sale made by the tax collector of the said city of Marysville, the three lots in question, and received a certificate of sale for the same. Thereafter in December, 1915, Johnson demanded a deed for the lots in accordance with the certificate of sale, and John Martin, then the owner of the lots, brought suit to quiet his title to the same and also to cancel the said certificate of sale. Judgment was entered in favor of Martin from which Johnson appealed to the Supreme Court and the judgment was affirmed on September 5, 1918. Martin v. Smith et al., 178 Cal. 812, 175 Pac. 16.

On September 12, 1917, Martin and his wife deeded the lots in question to Dunning Brothers Company, the plaintiff in the present action. At the time of the making of this deed it was discovered for the first time that there was a mistake in the description of the lots as contained in the pleadings and judgment in the said case of Martin v. Smith et al., in this, that throughout all the proceedings in said case as well as in the judgment the lots were described as lots 2, 3, and 4 of block 1, in range letter "J," instead of in range letter "I," as the lots, blocks, and ranges are laid down, numbered, and designated upon the record map of said city of Marysville. The present suit was subsequently commenced to quiet plaintiff's title to the lots and for a decree correcting the mistake contained in the said judgment.

Upon the question of mistake the court upon ample and sufficient evidence found as follows:

"That, however, by inadvertence throughout all the pleadings in said action tried as aforesaid, and in said judgment, said lots of land above mentioned were described as being in range letter 'J,' instead of the true range, namely range letter 'I,' in said city. Said mistake was mutual between all the parties to said action and the cause was commenced, tried and determined upon the theory, and upon the belief upon the part of all the parties to said action and on the part of the court determining the same, that said lots were in said pleadings correctly described. While in truth and in fact the description thereof was incorrect, locating said lots in range letter 'J,' instead of the true range, namely, range letter 'I' in said city."

That a court of equity has the power to correct a mistake like the one here in question is too plain to admit of doubt. In Quivey v. Baker, 37 Cal. 465, a mortgage by mistake described a different lot from the one intended by the parties to be mortgaged. In fact, there was no such lot as the one erroneously described. Suit was afterwards commenced to foreclose the mortgage, the complaint describing the property by the same erroneous description contained in the mortgage. In the decree of foreclosure and in the sheriff's deed was the same mistake in description. It was held that an action would lie to correct all the mistakes and that equity will go back to the original transaction and reform all three so as to make them conform to the original intention of the parties. See, also, Busey v. Moraga, 130 Cal. 586, 62 Pac. 1081; Donald v. Beals, 57 Cal. 399. In Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 Pac. 317, it was held that—

"The power of a court of equity to relieve against judgments is not confined to cases where they have been procured by fraud, but extends also to judgments wrongfully given by reason of mistake either of the court or of the injured party unmixed with fraud, and not the result of the negligence of the injured party."

In Partridge v. Harrow, 27 Iowa, 96, 99 Am. Dec. 643, there was a judgment ordered by the district court in favor of plaintiff, in an action on a note, and the clerk was directed to assess the amount due, that by mistake the clerk assessed the amount due at $223.36, instead of $370, and judgment was entered accordingly, defendants appealed to the Supreme Court and the judgment was affirmed, an execution was issued on the judgment and the amount thereof collected; thereafter, and more than one year after the rendition of the judgment, the mistake was discovered. The court said:

"The fact that the judgment of the district court had been affirmed in this court did not deprive that court of jurisdiction of this case. The judgment, as entered in the district court, was appealed from and affirmed, but that affirmation does not operate to prevent the correction of the judgment by the district court in respect to a matter that was not passed upon by this court. The petition shows that the affirmance of the judgment in the amount as rendered by the district court was also a mistake, and it cannot be doubted that such mistake may likewise by proper proceeding be corrected."

The demurrer interposed by the defendant to the complaint was properly overruled by the court and we find no error in the record. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

STONE v. PORTER-BURNHAM CO.
(Civ. 2848.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, Division 1. May 11, 1920.)

Sales — 89—Evidence held to support finding that agreement sued on had not been modified.

In an action to recover a balance of purchase price of potatoes sold, wherein defendant sought to prove a new agreement, rescinding the one sued on, and reducing the price of the potatoes, evidence held to support a finding that such new agreement had not been made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by J. H. Stone against the Porter-Burnham Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Morris, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. A. McGinn and Wm. B. Beaizley, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Pursuant to the terms of a written contract the plaintiff delivered to the defendant a crop of potatoes for which the defendant agreed to pay at the rate of 2 cents per pound. This action was brought to recover the unpaid balance of money due for the merchandise so delivered. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount demanded, and the defendant appeals from that judgment.

The answer of the defendant alleged that prior to the delivery of any of the potatoes it was learned that the potatoes were not of the quality specified in the written contract; that thereupon a new agreement was entered into whereby the first contract was rescinded and a new agreement of sale was made at the reduced price of $1.75 per hundred pounds; that pursuant to said new agreement the defendant received the potatoes thereafter delivered to it.

The court found against the defendant on the affirmative defense thus presented. The only question presented on this appeal arises upon the contention of appellant that this finding of the court was not sustained by the evidence. The writing alleged to constitute the new agreement was received in evidence in connection with the testimony of the defendant's agent, who testified that it was signed by the plaintiff in the presence of said agent, and that he delivered to the plaintiff a copy thereof. This was a receipt for money paid, with data indicating the $1.75 rate. The plaintiff would not admit that the signature to such paper was his signature, but did admit that it looked like his signature. On the other hand, he testified that the only paper which he did sign was merely a receipt for money, which did not contain the same figures contained in the document presented in evidence by the defendant; particularly that it did not contain any reference to the $1.75 price to be paid, and that he did not receive any copy of the paper signed by him. Defendant's agent testified to the facts alleged in the affirmative defense to the effect that the plaintiff had agreed with him for a rescission of the original written contract and for a new sale at the reduced rate of $1.75 per hundred pounds. The plaintiff denied that such conversation ever occurred, and denied that he had signed any writing providing for such reduced rate. The testimony of the plaintiff as to these matters was corroborated by the testimony of disinterested persons, who testified that defendant's agent had told them on the same day as the date found on said alleged new agreement that defendant was paying the plaintiff for his crop of potatoes at the rate of 2 cents per pound, and that now he would not pay more than $1.75 for the potatoes of said witnesses because the market price had gone down. Without further outlining the evidence, enough has been said to show that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding of fact as made by the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENNETT v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF HOLLYWOOD. (Civ. 3253.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 11, 1920.)

1. Banks and banking ⚡148(2)—Bank liable for money paid out on forged indorsement.

A bank had no right to charge a depositor's account with money paid out upon a check, where the indorsement of the payee was forged.

2. Banks and banking ⚡148(2)—Bank not entitled to credit on money paid on forged indorsement by reason of money paid by forger to drawer.

Where T. forged note and mortgage and obtained a loan thereon in the name of the person whose name was forged, and received a check for one half of the loan payable to order of the third person, and forged the indorsement and received the money from a bank, and a check for the other half was later given to T., who cashed the same, and thereafter T. repaid one-half of the loan to the drawer of the check, the fact of such payment by the forger to the drawer did not entitle the bank to any credit on the amount paid out on the check with the forged indorsement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by George Bennett against the First National Bank of Hollywood. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Evans, Abbott & Pearce and W. E. Evans, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff against the First National Bank of Hollywood to recover the sum of $1,000, which the bank charged to his account because of the payment of a check drawn by him thereon and upon which the name of the payee was forged. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals upon the judgment roll.

As appears from the findings, the facts are as follows: In August, 1917, one S. W. Thomas, then a man of good repute and president of the Garvanza Investment Company, falsely represented to plaintiff that he was the agent of Abbie Gilbert (who was in fact a real person), and that she desired a loan of $2,000, to be secured by mortgage upon certain real estate owned by her. Plaintiff agreed to make the loan, and some days thereafter Thomas delivered to him a note and mortgage purporting to be executed by Gilbert, both of which documents were in fact forged instruments. Thereupon plaintiff delivered to Thomas a check for $1,000, drawn upon defendant bank and payable to the order of Abbie Gilbert whose name Thomas, without her consent or knowledge, indorsed thereon and deposited it in the First National Bank of Glendale to the credit of the Garvanza Investment Company, the account of which he used for his own purposes, and which check, upon being presented to defendant, was paid in due course on August 22, 1917. Thereafter, to wit, on August 27, 1917, in advancing the balance due upon said purported loan, plaintiff gave his check upon defendant bank for $1,000 payable to the order of S. W. Thomas, who duly indorsed the same, which defendant paid to the account of said Garvanza Investment Company upon presentation, likewise charging the same to plaintiff's account. Prior to the time when the Garvanza Investment Company received the proceeds of the Thomas check, all the money represented by the Gilbert check was by it checked out and paid to persons not here concerned. While Thomas, between September 4, 1917, and April 5, 1918, paid plaintiff in installments the sum of $1,000, which sums were credited generally upon the forged note of Abbie Gilbert, no part thereof was from the proceeds of the Gilbert check. Neither Abbie Gilbert nor the parties hereto learned of the fraudulent nature of the transactions until September, 1918, at which time plaintiff demanded payment from defendant of his $1,000 so paid out on the Gilbert check. The court further found that plaintiff was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to the action of defendant in making said payment, and that the payment of $1,000 made by Thomas on said purported note of Gilbert "was not made at the expense of or to the injury of defendant, and that plaintiff was not (thereby) benefited beyond his total loss."

Upon these findings appellant attacks the court's conclusion of law based thereon:

"That plaintiff had a right to apply the whole sum of $1,000 paid by S. W. Thomas to plaintiff on account of the said note and mortgage in liquidation of the said check of $1,000 made and delivered by plaintiff to said S. W. Thomas on the 27th day of August, 1917, and to apply no part of the same on the said check of $1,000 payable to said Abbie Gilbert."

Defendant's unauthorized act in paying the Gilbert check upon which the indorsement was forged is conceded by appellant (Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 406, 13 Am. Rep. 190), who, however, insists that defendant should have the benefit of the $1,000 paid by Thomas in liquidation of any damage sustained by plaintiff on account of such unauthorized action on its part.

[1] That defendant had no right to charge plaintiff's account with the $1,000 so paid out upon the forged indorsement of the Gilbert check is not open to controversy, but in fact conceded by appellant, which, however, insists that equitably it is entitled to have the $1,000 paid plaintiff by Thomas applied in liquidation of its liability, and hence, if so applied, defendant has been reimbursed for the loss sustained by its unwarranted act. Its argument in support of this contention is predicated chiefly upon the claim that the loss was due to plaintiff's negligence, which, in the absence of the evidence, is fully answered by the finding of the court that defendant's action was not due to any negligence on the part of plaintiff.

[2] The action is not based upon the fraud practiced by Thomas upon plaintiff. That is no concern of defendant. It is true that plaintiff, for some reason not appearing, delivered to Thomas a check payable to his order for $1,000, which Thomas in due course cashed; but such act (whatever plaintiff's intention, since the Gilbert note was a nullity) created a personal liability on the part of Thomas, who was the only person answerable therefor, and if not paid an action for recovery would lie against him alone. The payment of any judgment obtained thereon could not be deemed the liquidation of defendant's liability to plaintiff in paying the Gilbert check. If this argument is sound, it follows that the situation is not changed by the fact that Thomas, without a judgment therefor, and from funds other than the proceeds of the Gilbert check (Andrews v. Northwestern National Bank, 107 Minn. 196, 117 N. W. 621, 780, 122 N. W. 499, 25 L. R. A. [N. S.] 996; Shipman v. Bank of State, 126 N. Y. 318, 27 N. E. 371, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821), paid to plaintiff the sum so received by him, and for which he alone was liable. As found by the trial court, the payment was not made at the expense or to the injury of the defendant. The payment was not made out of any fund belonging to it, nor, as to the loss due to defendant's action, was plaintiff benefited by the payment. No equitable reason occurs to us why the sum paid by Thomas should be applied in liquidation of defendant's liability to plaintiff, from which it follows that defendant still has $1,000 of plaintiff's money.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 10, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨ 296—Purchaser in default cannot maintain equitable defense against seller's ejectment.

Buyers of land in possession under contract of purchase, not having performed their contract, and in default with payments, cannot maintain equitable defense to the seller's action of ejectment by setting up his misrepresentations that the property was unincumbered, etc.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨ 296—Purchasers must either perform or rescind.

Purchasers of land in default must either pay the purchase price according to contract and receive whatever title seller is able to give, if they choose to retain possession, or may rescind, seller having misrepresented his title, and restore possession to him and recover price paid, with expenses, less rental value, and, having adopted neither course, but retained possession while in default in payments, are liable to the seller in ejectment wherein judgment restoring him to possession without decreeing return of the price to the purchasers is not erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Ada Hinckman against Ernest Walter Smith Delacour and Kathleen Fielding Delacour. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Clarence S. Preston and E. H. Lamme, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Fred O'Farrell, of San Diego, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an action brought by plaintiff, as vendor in a contract for the sale of real estate, against the defendants, who were vendees in possession, to recover possession of the land, and damages for the retention thereof, after alleged breach of the contract in failing to make payments, and for a judgment declaring the contract to have been broken, quieting plaintiff's title to the land, and for general equitable relief.

The defendants in their amended answer to the complaint denied a willingness on the part of the plaintiff to carry out the terms of the contract, and pleaded an affirmative equitable defense, based upon the ground of false and fraudulent representations, made to induce them to purchase the land. The same affirmative matter was set up in an amended cross-complaint, with a prayer for a rescission of the contract, and for an accounting of moneys paid to the plaintiff, and a finding as to the amount cross-complainants had expended in the necessary and proper care and maintenance of the property, and for judgment therefor. Plaintiff demurred to the amended answer, and amended cross-complaint, and moved to strike out all the affirmative matter contained therein. The demurrer to the amended cross-complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and the court struck from the answer all of the affirmative matter pleaded as a defense.

By the judgment of the lower court plaintiff was awarded the immediate possession of the land, the contract of sale was canceled, and the plaintiff was given nominal damages for the detention. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll, claiming error on the part of the lower court in sustaining the demurrer to the amended cross-complaint, and in striking from the answer the matter alleged by way of an equitable defense. They also contend that the judgment was erroneous in giving the plaintiff possession of the land without a return of the purchase price.

Under the contract of sale entered into by the parties on February 8, 1912, the defendants agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $18,000 for the land, $6,000 of which sum was paid when the contract was executed, the balance to be paid in semiannual installments of $500 each until the entire purchase price was paid, the first payment to be made on August 8, 1912. The defendants took immediate possession of the land, and have continued in possession thereof ever since. They made the payment of $500, due August 8, 1912, a payment of $250 on February 10, 1913, and a payment of $250 on August 8, 1913, since which time they have paid nothing on the contract. On December 27, 1916, the plaintiff, in writing, notified the defendants that they were in default, and that she insisted upon full compliance with the contract, and payment within 10 days, of all unpaid installments and interest. No payments being made by the defendants, the plaintiff made demand, in writing, for the possession of the premises, which being refused, she brought this action in ejectment, and for damages.

By way of their attempted equitable defense, the defendants alleged that at the time of the making of the contract the plaintiff stated that the title to the property was unincumbered, whereas it was subject to certain easements for pipe lines; misrepresented the amount of the annual income from the place; represented the amount of land to be 32.63 acres, whereas a highway dedicated to public use required and occupied 2 acres; and misrepresented the real purpose for which she desired to sell the property. Defendants further averred that upon discovering the alleged falsity of these representations they demanded of the plaintiff a rescission of the contract, and that they would make no more payments thereon, but would continue to demand an immediate rescission of the contract and repayment of all sums of money paid thereunder. at the same time offering to surrender the possession of the property, together with everything received by the defendants from the plaintiff, under the terms of the agreement. This demand of rescission, and offer in connection therewith, was rejected by the plaintiff. Defendants further allege that they have at all times offered, and do now offer, and are ready and willing, upon the repayment to them of the amount paid to plaintiff under the contract, and any other sums that the court may find to be legally due for money expended on the property, to return to plaintiff the possession of all of said property, together with all things received from her, the said plaintiff, by these defendants under said contract. They have not done so, however, and no other reason is given for withholding possession of the land from the plaintiff.

[1] From the situation thus presented by the pleadings, it is at once seen that the defendants, vendees in possession, under a contract of purchase, not having performed their contract, and being in default with their payments, are attempting to maintain an equitable defense to an action of ejectment by the vendor. Such a defense may not be maintained. The case is very similar in its essentials to Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, wherein, at page 530, 91 Pac. 498, at page 500, the court said:

"So far as the defense made by the answer is concerned, the case is simply that of a vendee who has received possession of the property from the vendors under a contract of sale, attempting to retain possession against the vendors without fulfilling his covenants as to payment."

As was said in another decision:

"It appears to be well established that, under such circumstances, the vendee cannot retain possession of the land, while neglecting to pay the price when due, and that the failure of the title does not give him the right to continue in possession by merely keeping good an offer to perform on his part conditioned upon performance by the vendor." Gervaise v. Brooks, 156 Cal. 103, 106, 103 Pac. 329, 331; Hoffman v. Remnant, 72 Cal. 1, 4, 12 Pac. 804.

The action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer to the amended cross-complaint, and in striking the affirmative matter from the answer, was therefore correct.

[2] Appellants urged that the judgment of the trial court, restoring plaintiff to the possession of the land, without decreeing the return of the purchase price to the defendants, was erroneous. There is no merit in this contention. As before stated, the defendants received possession of the land from the plaintiff under the contract, and can retain possession only by fulfilling their covenants which they therein made. It was not necessary for the purposes of this case, an action in ejectment, to determine whether or not the respondent had a good and sufficient title, or whether or not defendants had been led to enter into the contract by false representations. If they desired to retain the possession acquired under the contract, they should have complied with their part of it. If they concluded not to comply, because the title was not satisfactory to them, or for any other reason, they were bound to restore possession to the plaintiff. Whatever cause of action they may have for the purchase money which they paid and for money expended in the preservation and maintenance of the property is another matter. It constitutes no defense to the present action. Either they must pay the purchase price, according to the contract, and receive such title as the vendor is able to give, if they choose to retain possession of the land, or they may rescind the contract, restore the possession to the vendor, and recover the purchase money paid, together with the other expenditures, after deducting therefrom the fair rental value of the premises. Having refused to adopt either course, they are liable to an action of ejectment by the vendor. Haile v. Smith, 128 Cal. 415, 419, 60 Pac. 1032. The law required them to surrender possession of the property or prove an eviction therefrom, before permitting the defense of failure of consideration, or a suit to recover the purchase price, or damages. Rhorer v. Vila, 83 Cal. 51, 55, 23 Pac. 274; Hannan v. McNickle, 82 Cal. 122, 126, 23 Pac. 271.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 7, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 856(5)—Scope of review of order granting new trial limited by form of court's order.

Where court granted defendant a new trial "solely on ground that, conceding the evidence given by the plaintiffs to be true, plaintiffs were not as a matter of law entitled to recover," defendant, on appeal by plaintiff from such order, cannot show that there were other errors occurring at the trial which entitled him to a new trial.

2. Municipal corporations $\hookrightarrow$ 705(10)—Automobilist, colliding with one having right of way, held guilty of contributory negligence.

An automobilist, traveling at about 12 miles per hour when approaching a crossing, was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law, where he continued to cross the intersection and collided with defendant's automobile, which had the right of way under a city ordinance, the automobiles approaching the intersection simultaneously, and could not recover, though defendant was driving at an unlawful and excessive rate of speed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by F. E. Kinney and wife against Joseph M. King. From an order granting a new trial, after verdict for plaintiffs, they appeal. Affirmed.

E. E. Morris and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Duke Stone, Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial in an action for damages resulting from an automobile collision. The plaintiffs, upon the trial of the action before a jury, were awarded a verdict in the sum of $5,000 damages. The defendant moved for a new trial upon several statutory grounds. The court granted said motion by an order which read as follows:

"Defendant's motion for a new trial is granted solely upon the ground that, conceding the evidence given by the plaintiffs to be true, plaintiffs were not as a matter of law entitled to recover."

[1] The plaintiffs have appealed from this order, and upon such appeal urge the single point that the trial court was in error in holding that the plaintiffs were guilty of contributory negligence, which, as a matter of law, would bar their recovery in this action. The respondent maintains that the trial court was right in so holding, and also undertakes to contend that there were certain other errors occurring at the trial which entitled him to a new trial, and devotes much space to a discussion of these alleged errors. We are of the opinion, however, that these matters are not proper subjects of discussion upon this appeal, in view of the limited form of the court's order in granting the motion for a new trial. We shall therefore confine ourselves to the single point urged by the appellants as a ground of reversal upon this appeal.

The facts of the case, as testified to by the plaintiffs, were these:

On the 9th day of January, 1916, the plaintiffs were proceeding in their Ford roadster automobile easterly on West Ninth street in the city of Los Angeles, approaching the intersection of said street with Lake street. West Ninth street is 50 feet wide between the curbs. Lake street is 44 feet wide between the curbs. At the same time the defendant was proceeding in a Cadillac car northerly on Lake street approaching its intersection with West Ninth street. There was a retaining wall on the southwest corner of these two streets which would obstruct the view of persons driving easterly on West Ninth street or northerly on Lake street, until each was within a few feet of the respective lines of intersection. The plaintiffs were familiar with the conditions at that particular intersection, since they lived but a few blocks westerly and passed there frequently. The plaintiff F. E. Kinney was driving his car, and as he came to the point of intersection was traveling at the rate of 10 or 12 miles an hour. As he came into view of Lake street he saw the defendant traveling northerly on Lake street somewhere between 30 and 50 feet from the line of intersection and going at a rate of from 30 to 35 miles an hour. The said plaintiff proceeded across Lake street, swinging to the left in an attempt to avoid a collision, but failing in this effort, since his car collided with that of the defendant at a point east and north of the center of the intersecting square of the two streets, from which collision the injuries resulted which give rise to this action.

The traffic ordinances of the city of Los Angeles, which it was stipulated were applicable to this intersection of these two streets and to the parties to this action, read as follows:

"Any person who shall ride, drive or propel, or who shall cause or permit to be ridden, driven or propelled, any vehicle at a rate of speed greater than 20 miles per hour * * * along or upon any street in the city of Los Angeles [outside of certain business districts] * * * shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

"The driver of every vehicle * * * shall drive such vehicle * * * in a careful manner with due regard to the safety and convenience of pedestrians and of vehicles and cars upon the streets upon which such vehicle or car is driven or operated."

"The drivers of all vehicles must look out for and give right of way to vehicles approaching simultaneously from their right at street intersections."

[2] Under these terms of said ordinances it may be taken as established by the plaintiffs' evidence in the case that the defendant, in approaching the intersection of the two streets in question at a rate of speed exceeding 30 miles per hour, was guilty of negligence per se; but, conceding this to be true, it must also be admitted, in view of the plaintiffs' own evidence, that when the plaintiff, F. E. Kinney, driving his automobile, approached the westerly line of intersection of these two streets, he saw the defendant's automobile traveling at such rate of speed and at such a point on Lake street as would bring the defendant's car in collision with his own, if each proceeded along his respective line of approach at his respective rate of speed across such intersecting streets. This being so, the plaintiffs and the defendant must be held to have been "approaching simultaneously such intersection," within the meaning and intent of the provision of the ordinance above set forth. It was therefore the plaintiff's plain duty under such ordinance to give to the defendant the right of way across such intersection, and this duty would be rather intensified than diminished by the fact that the defendant was seen by the plaintiffs traveling at an excessive and illegal rate of speed in making his approach to the point of intersection of these two streets, since the ordinance expressly requires drivers in the plaintiffs' position to "look out for" such vehicles as were entitled to the right of way. Clearly the plaintiffs, in attempting to proceed on their way across Lake street, were, under the circumstances as detailed by themselves, acting in direct violation of the terms of said ordinance, when, before entering upon such intersection, they saw the defendant approaching simultaneously such intersection on Lake street at an excessive rate of speed and having the right of way. The same doctrine which renders the defendant's breach of this ordinance through exceeding the speed limit negligence per se renders also the plaintiffs guilty of negligence per se in essaying to cross Lake street in front of the defendant and in disregard of his right of way. The plaintiffs offer as an excuse for their attempt to cross Lake street in front of the defendant's car that, after seeing him, they would be unable to stop their car in time to avoid a collision; but this excuse is not adequate, since the plaintiffs were bound to so operate their car in making their approach to an intersection, across which others had the right of way, as to be able to stop within such distance as would permit said right to be exercised by those entitled to it and approaching simultaneously the intersection.

The case of Bullis v. Ball, 98 Wash. 342, 167 Pac. 942, deals aptly with the precise question involved in this case in construing a similar ordinance. It says:

"The purpose of the ordinance giving to vehicles moving in a northerly or southerly direction the right of way at street intersections was to prevent collisions, to obviate the very exigency which here arose. It was foreseen that at some time vehicles approaching street intersections would very probably meet and collide. To prevent this the ordinance above referred to was enacted. Its purpose demands no explanation. It is quite clear. The rights and duties which it creates are equally clear. The driver on the street running north and south must exercise that degree of care which is ordinarily commensurate with the safety and welfare of others with whom he may come in contact at street intersections. But, while it is true that he must exercise ordinary care, the superior right to passage over the intersection is his. It is a right expressly conferred upon him by authoritative enactment, a right which must be observed and respected by others using streets at the points of intersection. This priority of right naturally and necessarily creates a corresponding duty on the part of the traveler using the street running east and west, a duty which consists in the exercise of a degree of care commensurate with the superior right of the person traveling the street running north and south. The duty necessarily implies that the driver of a vehicle on a street running east and west shall slacken speed for the purpose of observing vehicles approaching the intersection on the street running north and south, and, should such vehicle be within a reasonable distance of the intersection, to wait until they have passed before attempting to continue across the intersection. The greater duty and the higher degree of care to be observed in such a situation is upon the person using the easterly and westerly street, if the ordinance in question is to be given any meaning, and any violation of this duty by the person injured which contributes in an appreciable degree to causing the collision in which his injuries are sustained will operate as a bar to his recovery."

Adopting these views, we are constrained to hold that the trial court was correct in ruling that the plaintiffs, in failing to yield to defendant the right of way under the circumstances of the instant case, were to be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law directly contributing to their injury, and hence were not entitled to recover in this action. The case of Whitelaw v. McGilliard, 179 Cal. 349, 176 Pac. 679, relied upon by the appellants, does not present a state of affairs similar to that in the case at bar, since in that case there was evidence showing that the plaintiff, who was injured, had already entered upon and was nearly across the intersecting street at the time when the defendant approached it at an illegal rate of speed. It was not, therefore, a case of simultaneous approach.

The case of Lawrence v. Goodwill, 186 Pac. 781, also presents a dissimilar situation from that disclosed in the case at bar, and does not involve the right of the trial court to determine upon the uncontradicted testimony proffered by the plaintiffs whether their failure to yield to defendant, approaching simultaneously the intersection in question, the right of way across the same, was negligence per se sufficient to prevent a recovery.

HYNES v. WHITE. (Civ. 3355.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 17, 1920.)

1. Gifts — 49(6)—Evidence held to establish gift of bonds.

Evidence of defendant, if true, held sufficient to establish a gift inter vivos of bonds, even though it showed that donor was immediately given absolute possession of them.

2. Evidence — 588—Court may not disregard unimpeached evidence.

A court may not arbitrarily disregard the unimpeached evidence of a single witness.

3. Gifts — 4—Intention, delivery, and acceptance are essential.

The three requisites of a valid gift are donor's intention to make it, delivery of thing given to donee, and donee's acceptance thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift.]

4. Evidence — 313—Declarations held to show donor's intention to make an unconditional gift.

Donor's declarations, both before and after the gift, held to tend to show an intention on his part to make an absolute and unconditional gift.

5. Gifts — 41—Mere possession by donor after completed gift does not revest title.

Where delivery of the property has once been made and possession transferred, the gift is irrevocable, and is not affected by the fact that donor immediately thereafter comes into physical possession and control of the property without any retransfer of the ownership by the donee.

6. Gifts — 28(2)—Donor's retention of key to deposit box held not inconsistent with gift.

Donor's retention of key to deposit box, in which donee kept the gift bonds, donee having made donor her deputy to visit the box, held not inconsistent with the idea of a gift, since donee had the possession, power, and right to take away the subject-matter of the gift, as well as the physical power and opportunity.

7. Gifts — 34—Donor's arrangement to repossess if donee died first held not inconsistent with gift.

Where donee of bonds gave donor, as her deputy, a key to her deposit box containing them, his intention to take them in case she died first, to prevent their going to her aunt, was not inconsistent with a gift to her, since a gift upon condition of reversion if donee died before donor would be valid, and also since the arrangement to repossess in such case was made after the gift had been completed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Suit by W. J. Hynes as administrator of the estate of Alexander Hay, deceased, against Peggy White, also known as Mrs. Douglas White. Judgment for plaintiff for part of items claimed, new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

David E. Bergman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cullinan & Hickey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAİN, J. The respondent, as the administrator of the estate of Alexander Hay, deceased, sued the appellant to recover certain bonds, or their value. In a second count the plaintiff sought to recover $500 with interest claimed to have been loaned by Hay to the defendant. The defendant denied the allegations of ownership of the bonds by the estate, and alleged affirmatively that Hay had canceled the note given by her to evidence the $500 loan. The case was tried without a jury. The trial court found that the defendant was not entitled to certain of the bonds claimed to have been given her May 31, 1913, because it was further found that they were intrusted to her without the intent on the part of Hay to make a gift. It was found that other securities claimed to have been given to the defendant in January, 1914, were given her, and also that Hay forgave her the $500 debt. It further found that the bonds found to belong to the estate had been sold by the defendant, and that their value was $5,874.50, for which amount judgment was rendered against her. A motion for new trial was denied, and it is claimed that the court erred therein, as also in certain proceedings during the trial concerning the tender of the oral evidence of the defendant to explain her evidence given on her deposition, on which alone the plaintiff rested his case. It is claimed the evidence does not support the findings, and because this court has reached that conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider the new trial ruling or the tender of the defendant's oral testimony.

The only evidence introduced on behalf of the plaintiff was the deposition of the defendant taken at the instance of the plaintiff. On the part of the defendant there was evidence introduced, strongly tending to support the evidence given by her at the taking of the deposition. Reduced to narrative form, the evidence concerning the claimed gift was that Alexander Hay at the time of the gift was about 70 years old. He was divorced many years before. His former wife had remarried twice, and at the time of the gift was living with her sister. After the divorce Hay took up his home with another sister, who was not living at the time of the gift, and the defendant and her brother were the children of that sister of the divorced wife. Hay was fond of the children, particularly of the defendant, and frequently assured her mother that in the event of her death, he would take care of his niece. She grew to young womanhood and married Douglas White, who at the time of the trial was general industrial agent of the Salt Lake Railroad. His business required him to travel a great deal, and apparently his wife at times traveled with him. There was no intimacy between the defendant and her two aunts. After the marriage of the defendant, who lived in Southern California with her husband, Hay visited their home on one or two occasions, and when they were in San Francisco, they visited him. He was an employé of the Custom Service in San Francisco, earning from $125 to $150 a month. He had no one dependent upon him and no near relatives. In 1913 Douglas White, who was in San Francisco, met Hay, who requested him to telegraph for his wife to come to San Francisco. On White telling him he was returning to Los Angeles that evening, and would send her up, Hay said, "Well, send her up just as quick as you can, because I wish to make arrangement regarding what little property I have."

In response to this request of Hay Mrs. White came to San Francisco, where she met Hay, and according to her evidence he asked her to go with him to the safe deposit vaults of the Union Trust Company, saying he had something to give her. Prior to that time he had kept a box in these vaults for his own use. Before the visit of Mrs. White he had rented a second box, which he took in her name, but for which she paid the rental. On receiving the box, he directed her to take it into one of the customer's rooms to which he also took his own deposit box. Taking from it the bonds found by the court not to have been given her, he said, "I want you to have these." She was asked if he did not say, "You are to have these bonds after my death, or something like that?" To this she responded: "He said, 'I give them to you now—they are yours. They belong to you.'" She was asked if he did not say, "I will use the income of these bonds and stocks during my lifetime, and you can have them after my death?" to which she responded, "No; but in the conversation he said, 'I am going to take you over to-morrow to see Mr. ———, of Sutro's, a brokerage firm, and introduce you, so he will know you and you will know him, and you can collect the money on the coupons.'" She put the securities in her box and they went to the desk, where she signed an order, making Hay her deputy to visit her box, and gave to him one of the two keys delivered to her. This arrangement was made pursuant to a conversation, which she stated was after the gift of the securities and manual delivery of them. She testified that he remarked, "You and Douglas are traveling around so much—suppose you get in a wreck or something—then this box would be closed to me, and, of course, I don't intend to give this to your heirs. I am giving it to you." The understanding of both parties at the time was that the reference to her heirs was to her two aunts, one of whom was Hay's former wife. The evidence introduced on behalf of the defendant was that of a number of people who knew Hay, and to whom he had stated after this transaction that he had given his property to Mrs. White. Mrs. White also testified that she had borrowed $500 from Hay, and had given her note for it; also that he had redelivered the note to her and told her she need not repay that $500, and directed her to cancel the note. Some time in 1914, she testified, she met Hay, and they again went to the safe deposit vaults, when he gave her another bond which she placed with those given her first. The day following the first transaction at the safe deposit vaults, Hay did introduce her to a young man in the banking house of Sutro & Co., and a day or two later he took her back to the safe deposit vaults to assure himself that she knew how to open the box. Prior to his death she cut the coupons from the bonds, giving them to Hay to collect, and, she testified, he paid her the interest collected.

[1, 2] From this evidence the trial court made the finding that Hay had no intention of giving the first bonds to the defendant because of the arrangement by which he was appointed her deputy to go into the box for the avowed purpose of preventing the bonds being taken by her two aunts in the event her death should occur before his own. The same conditions surrounded the gift of the bond in 1914, and he had the same right of access to it as he had to the first bonds, yet the trial court believed the evidence of Mrs. White in regard to that gift, as he believed her evidence in regard to the gift of the $500 note. To reach this conclusion, he must have rejected her positive statement that the conversation which led to her appointing Hay her deputy took place after the gift, although in close connection with it. The only evidence bearing on the intention of Hay to make the first gift was that of Mrs. White. A court may not arbitrarily disregard the unimpeached evidence of a single witness. If her statement was true, all the elements of a gift inter vivos were present, and if the gift was made, even though the donor was immediately given absolute possession of the property, it did not militate against the gift.

[3] The cases are uniform regarding the three requisites of a valid gift: First. An intention on the part of the donor to make it. Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308; Beaumont v. Beaumont, 152 Fed. 55, 81 C. C. A. 251; Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867; Stewart v. Whittemore, 3 Cal. App. 213, 84 Pac. 841. Second. A delivery to the donee of the thing given. Civ. Code, § 1147; Beaumont v. Beaumont, supra; Beebe v. Coffin, 153 Cal. 174, 94 Pac. 766; Knight v. Tripp, supra; Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 426, 53 Pac. 931; Beaver v. Beaver, 117 N. Y. 421, 22 N. E. 940, 6 L. R. A. 403, 15 Am. St. Rep. 531. Third. Acceptance by the donee of the thing given. Beaumont v. Beaumont, supra; Holmes v. McDonald, 119 Mich. 563, 78 N. W. 647, 75 Am. St. Rep. 430; Bea- ver v. Beaver, supra; Frazier v. Perkins, 62 N. H. 69.

[4] The declarations of the donor both before and after the gift tended to show an intention on his part to make an absolute and unconditional gift. Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269; Ruiz v. Dow, supra; Stewart v. Whittemore, supra; Thornton on Gifts and Advancements, § 222 et seq.; Garrison v. Union Trust Co., 164 Mich. 345, 129 N. W. 691, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 219; Waite v. Grubbe, 43 Or. 406, 73 Pac. 206, 99 Am. St. Rep. 764; Reese v. Phila. Trust, etc., 218 Pa. 150, 67 Atl. 124, 120 Am. St. Rep. 880.

[5] Where delivery of the property has once been made and possession transferred, the gift is irrevocable, and is not affected by the fact that the donor immediately thereafter comes in physical possession and control of the property without any retransfer of the ownership by the donee. Beaumont v. Beaumont, 152 Fed. 55, 81 C. C. A. 251.

[6] In this case, as in that, it is contended that the retention of the key of the safe deposit box by the donor with the right to resort to it, in that case for the purpose of getting the coupons, was such a retention of control and possession as would enable him to carry the bonds away, and was therefore inconsistent with the idea of a gift of the same. But the donee had the same possession and the same power of taking away the subject-matter of the gift, and not only so, but she had the rightful power to do so as well as the physical opportunity. The cases are practically uniform in support of this rule of law. Reese v. Phila. Trust, etc., supra; Calkins v. Equitable, etc., 126 Cal. 531, 59 Pac. 30; Stewart v. Whittemore, supra; Pink v. Church, 14 N. Y. Supp. 337; Martin v. Martin, 170 Ill. 18, 48 N. E. 694; Garrison v. Union Trust (Mich.), supra; Gilkinson v. Third Ave. R. Co., 47 App. Div. 472, 63 N. Y. Supp. 792; Waite v. Grubbe, supra; Marston, Adm'r, v. Marston, 64 N. H. 146, 5 Atl. 713; Blanchard v. Sheldon, 43 Vt. 512; Riegel v. Wooley, 81 Pa. 227.

[7] On the part of the respondent it is argued that the intention to enable the donor to repossess himself of the bonds upon the death of the donee was inconsistent with a gift to her. The court cannot accept this view of the case for two reasons: In the first place, the gift would have been a valid one if coupled with a condition that upon the death of the donee the property should revert to him; and, secondly, in this case the trial court was bound, as is this court, by the positive and uncontradicted evidence of the only witness to the matter that the arrangements for the donor to repossess himself of the property in the event of the death of the donee before his own was made after the gift had been completed. Neither this court, nor the trial court, could reach a determination that the first gift was invalid because, if the donee had died first, the donor might not have been able to establish his right to the bonds. The only evidence in the case fails to support the finding of the trial court against the existence of an intent on the part of the donor to make the gift.

The judgment is reversed.

HEATH v. JUDSON FREIGHT FORWARDING CO. (Civ. 2661.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 10, 1920.)

1. Carriers ⇐72—Telegram sufficient notice to withhold shipment.

A telegram to a forwarding company, "Hold shipment further instructions if not shipped wire my expense whether shipped or not," was sufficient notice to charge the forwarding company with the duty of withholding the goods from shipment.

2. Carriers ⇐4—Forwarding company when a carrier.

If goods are deposited with a forwarding agent merely as the initiatory step towards starting them in itinere, the forwarding agent having undertaken to do no more than to safely keep the goods and forward them when the opportunity offers itself, and being in no wise interested in their carriage after delivery to the carrier, such agent cannot be regarded as a common carrier; but where the forwarding agent undertakes to transport the property from its location in one city to another city, for through rates less than the published rates of the railroad company for broken lots, and a carload is billed to a distributing agent of the forwarding agent at the point of destination, such forwarding agent assumes, while holding the property for accumulation, the liability of a common carrier.

3. Carriers ⇐72 — Forwarding agent must withhold goods from shipment on owners' orders.

A forwarding agent, whether treated as a forwarder or as a common carrier, must obey any reasonable order to withhold the goods from shipment, and a forwarding agent, that for hire undertakes the carriage of goods of another in a car of its own selection and delivery to the owner at the place of destination through its own distributing agent, cannot carry the goods on to its place of destination as contracted for against the owner's consent.

4. Carriers ⇐72—A forwarding company must unload goods on order to withhold.

A forwarding company, given an order to withhold shipment of goods which had been loaded with other goods in a car of which it still had control, was liable to the owner of the goods, where it failed to unload and withhold the same, where, although expense of unloading would be $20, an expense not out of proportion to the value of the goods.

5. Carriers ⇐188 — Entitled to reasonable charge for unloading on order to withhold shipment.

Where a forwarding company, whether considered as a forwarder or a carrier, unloads a car on the order of the owner of the goods to withhold same from shipment, there is an implied agreement on the part of the owner to pay a reasonable charge for the unloading, to secure which the forwarder has a lien on the goods, under Civ. Code, §§ 1856, 2144.

6. Carriers ⇐157—Limitation for filing claim with forwarder inapplicable to claims arising from forwarder's own dereliction.

A clause in a receipt given by a forwarding company, "Claim for any loss or damage must be presented within thirty (30) days from date of arrival of shipment at destination," etc., referred to claims for loss or damage while the goods were in transit due to some fault of the railroad company, and was not intended to cover a claim for damages due to the forwarder's failing to withhold the goods from shipment on shipper's order.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Frank Heath against the Judson Freight Forwarding Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. T. Sherer and Bicksler, Smith & Parke, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant, a New York corporation, is engaged in the business of shipping and forwarding freight of all kinds, especially household furniture, from New York City to all points in the United States. For this purpose, defendant, at its loading station in Newark, N. J., assembles goods of various ownership that are to be shipped to a common destination. This is done for the purpose of making up a carload, that thereby a through rate may be obtained that is less than the published rates of the railroad company for broken lots. The accumulated carload, so assembled for any given destination, is billed to defendant's distributing agent at the point of destination, and such distributing agent distributes the goods to the various owners at that place.

In the month of December, 1916, plaintiff, who then resided in New York, desiring to ship his household furniture to Los Angeles, which city he contemplated making his home, entered into a contract at New York with defendant, whereby defendant agreed to prepare plaintiff's household furniture for shipment and ship it from New York to Los Angeles. Plaintiff left the city of New York and arrived in Los Angeles about December 11, 1916. On December 18, 1916, defendant wrote a letter to plaintiff, addressed to the latter at Los Angeles, wherein defendant informed plaintiff that, owing to a freight congestion, plaintiff's household goods had not, as yet, arrived at the defendant's loading station at Newark.

On December 29, 1911, at Los Angeles, plaintiff, having decided to return to New York, sent to defendant, addressed to it at its New York office, a telegram reading as follows:

"Hold shipment further instructions if not shipped wire my expense whether shipped or not."

This telegram was received by defendant at its New York office on December 30, 1916, at 9:30 o'clock a. m. At that time plaintiff's household furniture had been loaded on a car at Newark, but, as yet, the car had not started on its journey to California. When the car was finally loaded, the carload consisted of 124 packages, 43 of which contained plaintiff's household furniture, the remaining packages containing goods belonging to other persons. Plaintiff's 43 packages were the first to be loaded on the car. So that, to unload plaintiff's household furniture, it would have been necessary to unload the entire car. This would have involved an expense of about $20.

At 9:45 a. m. on December 30, 1916, which was a Saturday, defendant telegraphed from New York to plaintiff at Los Angeles as follows:

"Your shipment loaded today do you authorize unloading cost about twenty dollars must have reply one o'clock New York time."

It is claimed by plaintiff that this telegram was not actually received by him at Los Angeles until 11:55 a. m. of December 30th, which would be 2:55 p. m. at New York.

As we have said, December 30, 1916, was a Saturday. The regular time for closing defendant's office on Saturdays is 1 o'clock p. m. On this occasion, however, an employé of defendant remained at its office on December 30th until 6 o'clock to receive any telegram that plaintiff might send in reply to that sent by defendant to plaintiff at 9:45 a. m. of that day. Plaintiff did send a telegram to defendant in reply to that which, he says, was delivered to him at 11:55 a. m. That telegram, filed at Los Angeles at 11:58 a. m. of December 30th, reads:

"Please unload goods and put in storage."

For some reason this telegram was not delivered to defendant on December 30th. Because the next day was Sunday, and the following day, January 1st, a holiday, plaintiff's telegram of December 30th was not received by defendant until Tuesday, January 2, 1917. Upon its receipt defendant sent plaintiff a telegram as follows:

"Unfortunately your goods forwarded Saturday evening your wire not received until this morning through error or negligence of telegraph company no reply to wire Saturday afternoon. Compelled to forward car."

We infer from the facts disclosed by the record that the car, loaded with plaintiff's household furniture and other shipments destined for Los Angeles, left Newark at about 6 o'clock p. m. of Saturday, December 30, 1916. On January 4, 1917, defendant wrote to plaintiff, addressed to him at Los Angeles, a letter which reads:

"We beg to advise that your shipment of household goods was forwarded on Dec. 30, 1916, in a through car from Newark, N. J. consigned to our distributing agent, Los Angeles Warehouse Co., 316 Commercial St. Los Angeles, Calif. The charges on this shipment amount to $270.66 which you should pay to the distributing agent above named, and with whom you should make arrangements for taking possession of your goods as soon as car arrives. The distributing agent will gladly answer any inquiries which you may wish to make relative to the matter. Usual storage charges will be assessed on goods which are not removed from freight house within forty-eight hours after arrival."

Upon these facts the trial court found that defendant had not disregarded plaintiff's instructions, and gave judgment for defendant. From that judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] Respondent contends that the first telegram received by it from appellant, that filed by appellant at Los Angeles on December 29th and received by respondent on the morning of December 30th, was so uncertain that respondent was not obliged to withhold the goods from shipment. With this contention we cannot agree. We think that, regardless of any delay in the receipt by respondent of appellant's telegram of December 30th, replying to that sent to appellant by respondent at 9:45 o'clock a. m. of that day, appellant's first telegram—that filed in Los Angeles on December 29th and received by respondent at New York on December 30th at 9:30 a. m.—was alone sufficient to charge respondent with the duty of withholding appellant's goods from shipment, and that because respondent did not do so it is liable for all damages proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom.

It seems that respondent undertook as a forwarder to transport appellant's goods from New York to Los Angeles as part of a carload consigned to respondent's distributing agent at Los Angeles; the shipment being handled in that way in order that respondent might obtain the benefit of the reduced rate which is made where goods are shipped in a carload lot instead of less than carload lots. We are inclined to the view that respondent's liability is that of a common carrier. If goods are deposited with a forwarding agent merely as the initiatory step towards starting them in itinere, the forwarding agent having undertaken to do no more than to safely keep the goods and forward them when the opportunity offers itself, and being in no wise interested in their carriage after delivery to the carrier, such agent cannot be regarded as a common carrier; but where, as here, the forwarding agent undertakes to transport the property from its location in one city to another city, for through rates less than the published rates of the railroad company for broken lots, which it is enabled to do by accumulating property for the given destination until a car can be filled, which is billed to its distributing agent at the point of destination, such forwarding agent assumes, while holding the property for accumulation, the liability of a common carrier. Judson Freight Forwarding Co. v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 163 Ill. App. 22; Ingram v. Am. Forwarding Co., 162 Ill. App. 476; Bare v. Am. Forwarding Co., 146 Ill. App. 388, affirmed in 242 Ill. 298, 89 N. E. 1021; Kettenhofen v. Globe Transfer & S. Co., 70 Wash. 645, 127 Pac. 295, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 902, and note, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 776.

[3] However, whether respondent be treated as a forwarder or as a common carrier, we think the law is clear that it was its duty to obey any reasonable order to withhold the goods from shipment that it might receive from appellant, the owner of the property. We also are of the opinion that appellant's first telegram to defendant—filed in Los Angeles on December 29th and received by respondent at New York the next morning at 9:30 o'clock—was sufficient as a definite instruction to hold the shipment.

Irrespective of whether its relation to the owner of the shipment be that of a common carrier or a mere forwarder, we are satisfied that a forwarding company that for hire undertakes the carriage of goods of another in a car of its own selection, and delivery to the owner at the place of destination through its own distributing agent, cannot carry the goods on to the place of destination, as contracted for, against the owner's consent. In this regard the obligation of the forwarder is not different from that of a common carrier; and what is said by the courts in cases against railroads and other indubitable common carriers is, we think, equally applicable to the situation presented here, whether respondent be regarded as a common carrier or as a forwarder only. Though we have found no case involving the duty of a forwarding agent to obey the owner's instructions not to ship, we think the case is controlled by the rule announced in an almost unbroken line of authorities, some of which are cited infra, that the true owner of goods to be transported by a common carrier retains some right of control, and, at any reasonable time before transportation has commenced, may order his goods to be withheld from shipment.

The owner does not renounce his right of all control over his goods by their delivery to a common carrier or to a forwarder. The latter stands in the relation of one employed as a bailee of goods for the purpose of obeying instructions of the true owner regarding them. The owner's right to control the shipment is an incident of his title. The title of the carrier or forwarder, whichever it may be, is subordinate to that of the owner. Aside from its lien for lawful charges, a forwarding company cannot be allowed to defeat the owner's right to control the shipment. Subject to the payment of a reasonable charge for the services necessitated by his order, the owner has the right either to stop the goods in transit or to stop their shipment before actual transportation has commenced. Scothorn v. South Staffordshire R. Co., 8 Exch. 341; Lewis v. Galena, etc., R. Co., 40 Ill. 281; Cincinnati, etc., R. Co. v. Steele, 140 Ky. 383, 131 S. W. 22, 140 Am. St. Rep. 388; Wente v. C., B. & Q. R. Co., 79 Neb. 179, 115 N. W. 859, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 756, and extended note; Virginia & Southwestern R. Co. v. Sutherland, 138 Tenn. 266, 197 S. W. 863, L. R. A. 1918B, 77, and note. In Scothorn v. South Staffordshire R. Co., supra, goods intended for shipment were marked originally, "East India Docks, London, by Melbourne Ship to Australia." Later the shipper notified the carrier to deliver the goods at Bell Wharf, Radcliffe, London. There was a failure to comply with the request, and the goods were forwarded to Melbourne and lost. In allowing the plaintiff to recover, the court said:

"It is argued that that is a contract. It is no contract in one sense; it is a person taking goods to be disposed of according to the directions of another, and is it to be contended that if, an hour afterwards, the owner has come back and said he wanted the goods again, the company could have said, 'No; you have made a contract for them; they shall go to the ship?' The contract with a carrier is that he is a bailee of the owner's goods to obey his directions respecting them; and I have no hesitation in saying that generally at any period of the transit he may have them back; and the saying that a railroad company could carry a man's goods on against his consent is a proposition not supported either by law or common sense. It may be different when the subsequent direction to the bailee is an unreasonable one. I can conceive a case where a man may have authorized goods being put in a place where it would be very inconvenient to take them out; but, generally speaking, it is otherwise. Suppose a man travels with luggage in a railway train and becomes dissatisfied with his journey, and says, 'I wish to go out of the train,' he has a right to do so, and take his luggage with him; but, if Mr. Gray is right, the company would be justified in saying, 'You have delivered your luggage to us, and we will take it on.' I apprehend the real circumstances of such cases as these are that, when a man delivers his goods to a carrier, he employs him as a bailee for reward; the man may be entitled to the reward, but the owner is entitled to have the goods back if he pleases."

[4, 5] It doubtless is true that, if the owner's goods have been put in a place where it would be very inconvenient to take them out, as, for example, if a trunk has been placed deep in the hold of a ship, under other cargo, and the ship is about to sail, so that taking the trunk out would delay the vessel's sailing, and thus involve an expense out of all proportion to the value of the trunk and its contents, the owner would not have the right to redelivery of his trunk at the port of departure. But here appellant's goods, without any very great inconvenience, could have been taken from the car at an expense not to exceed $20—an expense not out of proportion to the value of the articles. For its services in taking his property from the carload, in obedience to appellant's instructions, respondent would not be allowed to charge more than a reasonable sum to compensate it for its trouble. Had it obeyed appellant's instructions, the law would have implied an agreement on the latter's part to pay a reasonable charge for the unloading. Carr v. Penn. Ry. Co., 92 N. Y. Supp. 799. To secure such charge, respondent would have had a lien on the goods. Civ. Code, §§ 1856, 2144.

The telegram upon which appellant must rest his case, the telegram filed in Los Angeles on December 29th and received by respondent on the morning of December 30th, was not punctuated. We quote it again:

"Hold shipment further instructions if not shipped wire my expense whether shipped or not."

Respondent says that this telegram, by different punctuations can be interpreted in at least four different ways. This may be so. But, regardless of how punctuated, or how interpreted, the telegram always contains the definite instruction, "Hold shipment." It may be that the telegram should be read as directing respondent to hold appellant's shipment until further instructions were received or to hold the shipment if the goods had not already been shipped. The goods had not been shipped, and, under any interpretation, respondent is definitely directed to "hold shipment." This it did not do. Having received a definite instruction to "hold shipment," respondent could not justify its course merely because it did not receive, until January 2, 1917, a reply to its telegram of December 30th, asking appellant if he "authorized unloading," and notifying him that the unloading would cost about $20.

It is claimed that respondent could not be required to unload appellant's household furniture in order to "hold shipment," unless appellant entered into a new contract with respondent to pay the latter for unloading the car, which, according to respondent's telegram of December 30th, would amount to about $20. This insistence overlooks the fact that the owner's right to control the goods, and, if he pleases, to stop the shipment and direct and receive a redelivery of the goods, is, by law, implied in the shipment contract itself as a part thereof (Virginia & Southwestern R. Co. v. Sutherland, supra), and further, that the law implies an agreement by the owner to pay a reasonable charge for any extra services that may be necessitated by his exercise of the right thus to control the shipment.

There is no merit in the contention that appellant himself could have stopped the goods before their arrival at Los Angeles. It appears from respondent's letter of January 4, 1917, that the goods were consigned by respondent, as consignor, to itself, or to its distributing agent at Los Angeles, as consignee. Appellant, therefore, could have done nothing save through respondent.

[6] Finally, it is contended that appellant cannot recover because he did not present a claim for his damages within 30 days. This contention is based upon a clause in the receipt that respondent gave the warehouseman from whom it received appellant's goods. That clause reads:

"* * * Claim for any loss or damage must be presented within thirty (30) days from date of arrival of shipment at destination. All particulars and proof of loss or damage required by railroad companies or other transportation agency to be furnished by the claimant. If goods are placed in storage, claim, if any, must be made before storing."

The "claim" referred to in this clause of the receipt is a claim for loss or damage, while the goods are in transit, due to some fault of the railroad company. The clause was not intended to cover a claim for damages due to respondent's own dereliction.

The judgment is reversed.

McCONNELL v. GAUT'S ESTATE et al.
(Civ. No. 3200.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 12, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1920.)

1. Husband and wife — 138(9)—Wife signing undelivered mortgage on husband's property and note not ratifying his previous acts as agent.

A wife, who merely signed her name to a note and mortgage on real property standing in her husband's name, as a dutiful wife, to facilitate his business, did not thereby ratify previous acts of her husband in his own behalf as having been done as her agent; the note and mortgage not being delivered.

2. Husband and wife — 138(1)—Previous signing of notes by wife did not make husband agent.

The fact that on previous occasions husband had procured his wife's signatures to notes, and that she had thereby become personally obligated thereon, did not of itself operate to constitute him her agent for all time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Emmet McConnell against Helen Lukens Gaut, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Jas. H. Gaut, deceased. From a judgment against the administratrix for the amount prayed for, but denying relief as against her individually, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Simpson & Simpson, of Pasadena, for appellant.

J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, for respondents.

WELLER, J. This action was brought to recover judgment against Helen Lukens Gaut, as administratrix of the estate of Jas. H. Gaut, deceased, and in her individual capacity, in the sum of $6,700, on account of certain moneys alleged to have been loaned by plaintiff to the decedent and his wife, the said Helen Lukens Gaut. The court below rendered judgment against the administratrix for the amount prayed, but denied relief as against her individually. From the latter portion of the judgment plaintiff appeals.

The following facts are shown by the findings: On December 15, 1913, the decedent, Jas. H. Gaut, was the owner of certain real property in Riverside county, subject to five incumbrances, aggregating $15,300, one, a mortgage in the sum of $6,000, signed by Gaut and wife, being held by plaintiff. On or about that date plaintiff and Jas. H. Gaut entered into a contract whereby they agreed that the property should be cleared of the incumbrances, that plaintiff would loan Gaut $6,700, that the latter should execute to plaintiff two promissory notes, each for $6,350, secure their payment by a mortgage upon the above-mentioned property, and procure his wife, the defendant, Helen Lukens Gaut, to sign the notes and mortgage. Prior to this, Gaut had borrowed the sum of $1,200 from plaintiff, and had given him a note signed by himself and wife, securing the payment thereof by a grant deed to the property, plaintiff, in turn, giving a receipt which, after stating that the deed was held as collateral security for the payment of the note, reads:

"I have accepted this deed with the understanding in event said James H. Gaut should fail to pay said note then I am at liberty to record said deed and take possession of said property. In event, however, said note is paid, I agree to return said deed to James H. Gaut or assigns. [Signed] E. McConnell."

Subsequently, plaintiff gave checks to Jas. H. Gaut, amounting to some $5,500, which, together with the $6,000 mortgage and the $1,200 note, made up the sum of $12,700, for which the notes and mortgage mentioned in the agreement were to be executed. Plaintiff then deposited releases of the mortgages held by him with the Title Insurance & Trust Company, with instructions to record them on delivery of the $12,700 note and mortgage. These instructions were approved by Jas. H. Gaut, who also agreed to pay to the depository the sum of $2,500 for the purpose of satisfying other liens and clearing title to the property. Before the deal was consummated, Jas. H. Gaut died, and the $12,700 note and mortgage were never delivered to plaintiff.

The court found that Helen Lukens Gaut, respondent, received no part of the consideration for the $1,200 note, but that she signed it at the request of Jas. H. Gaut, as his wife, and not otherwise, and that she received no part of the moneys borrowed by Jas. H. Gaut, which made up the $12,700 in notes.

The complaint, as originally framed, prayed for a decree requiring the defendant, individually and as administratrix, to execute and deliver the $12,700 note and mortgage, or, in case this could not be done, that plaintiff have judgment in the sum of $6,700. While the action was pending, the prayer for specific performance was abandoned by stipulation and the case proceeded for the recovery of a personal judgment.

Appellant attacks the portion of the judgment which exonerates the respondent from personal liability, claiming that she is bound by the acts of her husband as her agent.

[1, 2] Plaintiff testified to several transactions had with Jas. H. Gaut, covering a period of some months, and in each case speaks of dealing with Jas. H. Gaut only. All checks were payable to Gaut, and all memoranda were made in his name alone. The receipt above quoted is an instance. It will be noted that no mention of Mrs. Gaut is made therein. Her only connection with the dealings between plaintiff and her husband was the signing of the $1,200 note—in which plaintiff apparently did not consider her interested, as he ignored her entirely in his receipt, and also when, at her husband's request, she signed the undelivered note and mortgage. Nowhere does it appear that Gaut assumed to act for his wife as her agent, or that he attempted to bind her in any way. Whatever obligation attached to her individually was the result of her own actions. She merely signed her name to the documents affecting the title to real property standing in her husband's name, as a dutiful wife, to facilitate his business. To hold that such actions on her part constituted ratification by her of all previous acts of her husband in his own behalf, as having been done as her agent, would transgress the limits of precedent and reason. The fact that on previous occasions Gaut had procured his wife's signature to notes, and that she had thereby become personally obligated thereon, could not of itself operate to constitute him her agent for all time and for all purposes; and the record discloses no other act or omission on her part that could be construed either as precedent authorization or subsequent ratification. If the notes and mortgage for $12,700 had been delivered, she no doubt would have been liable for any deficiency after a sale of the mortgaged property under decree of foreclosure. But that was the extent of her obligation. There being no delivery of the notes and mortgage, she did not become obligated to pay anything on the notes.

The judgment is affirmed.

et al. (Civ. 2816.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

A finding by the trial court based on conflicting evidence cannot be reviewed.

2. Municipal corporations §373(3)—Wetting curb held done under contract so as to extend time for lien notices.

Where a contract for a concrete curb required wetting down the curb for 7 days, and that the work be done to satisfaction of street superintendent, and the latter required wetting down for 10 days, which the contractor did under his protest that work for the last 3 days was nevertheless done under the contract, so that the time for filing lien notices dates from its completion.

3. Municipal corporations §373(3)—Verification of lien claim of corporation for materials furnished contractor held sufficient.

Where a lien claim for materials furnished contractor by a corporation was signed with the corporation named by the president and verified by the individual who signed as president, who swore that he was president and knew that the facts stated were true, the affidavit sufficiently showed that the verification was made on behalf of the corporation.

4. Municipal corporations §373(3)—Statement of nonpayment in claims held sufficient.

Statement in lien claim for materials furnished contractor that the amounts claimed were due and unpaid, that the contractor had agreed to pay for the materials, but that no part had been paid except a stated sum, held sufficient statement of nonpayment.

5. Municipal corporations §373(3)—Unnecessary statement in claim held not to defeat lien for material furnished contractor.

A statement in lien claim for material furnished contractor that it was a lien on any moneys, warrants, or bonds on account of material furnished for a public improvement, even though not required in the notice, could not have misled or prejudiced the sureties on the contractor's bond, and do not defeat the lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by the Barr Lumber Company against the Joy Construction Company and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Newmire & Watkins, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Behymer & Craig, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal by the defendants W. R. Hefley and Charles C. Hayes from a judgment entered against them as sureties on a bond given by a contractor under the street improvement law known as the Vrooman Act (Deering's Gen. Laws, Ed. of 1915; Act 3930, p. 1714). The plaintiff sued on a claim for materials furnished by it, and on two assigned claims of a similar nature, all being for materials used by the contractor in performance of the work. After the work had been actually completed, verified statements were filed with the street superintendent of the city of Whittier, with whom the contractor had made his contract, as follows: On May 24, 1916, by the plaintiff; on May 25, 1916, by plaintiff's assignor A. H. Gregg; and on May 24, 1916, by plaintiff's assignor C. Forsyth & Son. It is claimed by plaintiff that these notices were filed in conformity with the requirements of section 6½ of said statute. The street superintendent accepted the work constituting said improvement on the 23d day of June, 1916. Additional notices of claim were filed with the street superintendent by the plaintiff and by Gregg on July 21, 1916, and by C. Forsyth & Son on July 28, 1916. As to these July notices, their sufficiency need not be discussed, if the earlier notices were filed within time and in due form.

Appellants claim that all of the notices were filed more than 30 days from the time the improvement was completed, and that therefore, under the terms of said section 6½, they were all filed too late, and that for that reason any right of action on said claims was lost. In the case of Pacific Sewer Pipe Co. v. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co., in which the decision of this court has this day been filed, it is held that the 30 days, not later than the end of which the claimant was required to file his statement with the board of public works (street superintendent, in the instant case) begins to run from the date of the actual completion of the work, and not from the date of the acceptance of the work by the board of public works or street superintendent.¹

[1] The principal question then is whether or not the notices filed with the street superintendent on May 24th and May 25th were filed within 30 days from the time the improvement was completed. The finding of the court is that the construction work under the contract was completed on the 25th of April, 1916, and not earlier than that date. Appellants claim that this finding is not supported by the evidence and that, as shown by the evidence, the work was completed not later than April 21, 1916. There is positive testimony that the work of construction, exclusive of what is known as the wetting down process, which follows the laying of the cement, was completed on April 15th. It was stipulated by plaintiff's counsel that the specifications called for the wetting down of the curbing for a period of 7 days, and that the work was to be done in a good and workmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction of the street superintendent of the city of Whittier. At about the time when the work was ready for the wetting down process to begin, a conversation occurred between Wilson, the contractor's foreman, and Stevens, the street superintendent, in which conversation the superintendent insisted that the specifications required that the cement be wet down for 10 days, whereas the foreman contended that they called for 7 days. The testimony of the foreman is that he acquiesced in the superintendent's demand to wet it for 10 days, and did so, and that he finished the wetting of the curb on April 24th. The street superintendent testified that this work was done up to and including April 25th.

[2] On this conflicting evidence we must accept the court's finding that the work was completed on and not before April 25th, unless we accept appellant's contention that the last 3 days of the wetting down process are not to be considered as a part of the completion of the contract, and that therefore the work must be held to have been completed at least as early as April 22d. But with this contention we do not agree. Since the work was to be done to the satisfaction of the street superintendent, and since there was a controversy between the parties as to what would constitute a sufficient wetting down process to make the work satisfactory, and since that controversy was actually settled by continuance of the work for the period required by the street superintendent in order to make the work satisfactory to him, it is our opinion that the work should not be deemed to have been completed until the 25th day of April. This being so, the notices of May 24th and May 25th were filed with the street superintendent within due time.

Finally it is contended that the first set of notices and claims filed did not comply with the requirements of section 6½ of the statute, because the form of verification in each of the claims was defective, in that the verified statements did not contain an allegation that the plaintiff's claim, or some part thereof, has not been paid, and did not show when the various items of materials were furnished.

[3] It is also claimed that the Barr Lumber Company's claim was defective, in that the affidavit of verification does not show that the verification was made by O. H. Barr on behalf of the corporation; also that the claims do not purport to hold the bondsmen responsible. The Barr Lumber Company's claim was signed, "Barr Lumber Company, by O. H. Barr, President." The affidavit of verification is signed "O. H. Barr," and the said O. H. Barr, "being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the president of the Barr Lumber Company, the corporation claimant above named, that he has read the foregoing claim, and that the facts therein stated are true." In each of the other claims the affiant, who was one of the claimants, stated in his affidavit of verification that he had read the foregoing claim, "and that the facts therein stated are true."

[4] In each of the claims a statement of the demand was made, and that the amount so claimed "is now due, owing and unpaid." The plaintiff's claim further stated that of the total amount which the contractor had agreed to pay for the materials furnished, "no part of the same has been paid," except a stated sum. The other claims filed specifically stated "that no part of the same has been paid." We think that these statements of the verified claims were sufficient to comply with the requirements of the statute.

[5] We further hold, contrary to the contention of appellants, that these claims as filed were not rendered insufficient by the statement made in each of them "that the said undersigned claims a lien upon any moneys, warrants, or bonds for the said sum as aforesaid on account of said material so furnished for said improvement." Conceding that the last-quoted words were not required to be in the notice, we cannot see that appellants, sureties on the contractor's bond, could have been in any manner misled or otherwise prejudiced thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHMIDT v. PURSELL et al. (Civ. 3362.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 11, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1920.)

1. Evidence — 46—Judicial notice not taken of order of Industrial Accident Commission.

Court cannot take judicial notice of a general order of the Industrial Accident Commission.

2. Master and servant — 352—Noncompliance with safety order not "gross negligence" within Compensation Act.

Failure of master to comply with general safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission of which he had no notice would not of itself constitute "gross negligence" within the meaning of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 12(b), as amended by St. 1915, p. 1081, § 2.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gross Negligence.]

3. Master and servant — 352—Safety order of Industrial Accident Commission not conclusively presumed reasonable in action for damages.

In an action by a servant for damages for gross negligence under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 12(b), as amended by St. 1915, p. 1081, § 2, general safety orders of the Industrial Accident Commission are not conclusively presumed to be reasonable and to fix reasonable and proper standards and requirements for safety, under section 66 of the act.

4. Master and servant — 352—General Safety orders of Industrial Accident Commission must be served upon employer under Compensation and Safety Act.

Safety orders of the Industrial Accident Commission do not become effective until served upon the employer, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 59.

5. Master and servant — 352—Essentials for recovery for gross negligence under Compensation Act stated; "willfully disregard."

It is incumbent upon a servant suing for personal injuries caused by gross negligence, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 12(b), as amended by St. 1915, p. 1081, § 2, to prove that injury resulted both from gross negligence and from willful disregard of life, limb, or bodily safety; the term "to willfully disregard" meaning to intentionally do or fail to do something which contributes to the injury, having actual knowledge of the perils incident thereto, or having what in law is equivalent to such actual knowledge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Frederick A. Schmidt against Henry Pursell and Arthur Pursell, doing business under the name and style of Pursell Bros. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Warren L. Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while in the employ of the defendants. Plaintiff chose to avail himself of section 12 (b) of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, as amended in 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1081, § 2), and effective at the time of the injury, and waived compensation under the act. Section 12 then provided that, when conditions of compensation existed, the right to recover pursuant to the provisions of the act should be the exclusive remedy against the employer, "except that when the injury was caused by the employer's gross negligence or willful misconduct and such act or failure to act causing such injury * * * indicated a willful disregard of the life, limb, or bodily safety of employes, any such injured employe may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or maintain an action at law for damages." The complaint alleged that the accident was the result of the gross negligence of the defendants in failing to properly equip a jointer machine upon which plaintiff was employed with the necessary safety appliances, and also that it was the result of the willful disregard of the life, limb, and bodily safety of the plaintiff on the part of said defendants in refusing and neglecting to equip said machine with such safety appliances. It was also alleged that the cylinder head and guard was a necessary equipment and part of said machine to prevent the operator thereof from coming in contact with the knife and mangle. These allegations were all denied by the answer, and the court found that the defendants were not guilty of gross negligence nor of a willful disregard of the life, limb, or bodily safety of the plaintiff in refusing to equip said machine with such safety appliances, and also that such safety appliances were not at the time a necessary equipment to prevent the operator thereof from coming in contact with the knife or mangle of the machine. It was also found, in accordance with the allegations of the answer, that plaintiff was thoroughly familiar with the workings and the danger incident to the use of the machine. The appeal is confined solely to an attack upon that portion of the findings which negative gross negligence on the part of the defendants.

The facts material to the opinion are that plaintiff had been in the employ of defendants for some five months prior to the accident and had become thoroughly familiar with the machine upon which he received the injury. He was an experienced operator and had worked for many years on machines of this nature, some of which had guards or safety devices; others had not. On July 20, 1917, five days prior to the date of the injury, an employé of the Industrial Accident Commission notified defendants that the machine should be equipped with a safety device, and, acting upon such notice, the defendants placed an order for such equipment, which, however, had not been received at the time of the injury. In this connection one of the defendants testified that they had not been notified prior to the 20th of July to equip the machine with a safety device, and that it was impossible to obtain one within the five days.

[1] The theory of appellant is that the failure of respondents to comply with the general order of the Industrial Accident Commission relating to the equipment of similar machines with safety devices, after having been personally instructed so to do in this instance by one of the employés of the commission, constitutes gross negligence entitling appellant to recover in this case. The argument in this connection is based upon a misunderstanding of the record, in that the record fails to disclose that any general order of the Industrial Accident Commission was offered or received in evidence. In the briefs it is argued that a certain general order of the commission required the equipment of similar machines with cylindrical cutter heads, but this order was not offered in evidence, and, though it may have been referred to in argument before the trial judge, it is not such a matter as can be given judicial notice. Thus the argument of appellant resolves itself into this, that the failure of defendants to equip the machine with safety devices immediately upon the direction of the employé of the Industrial Accident Commission constitutes gross negligence on their part. In his opening brief it is said:

"We would not be understood as insinuating that violation of the statute in itself constituted 'gross negligence.' That is not our position here."

[2-4] If the violation of a statute in itself does not constitute gross negligence (and there is respectable authority to that effect, though in reserving decision upon that point in an order denying a hearing after judgment in the District Court of Appeal of the Second District in Helme v. Great Western Milling Co., 185 Pac. 510, our Supreme Court has cast some doubt upon the extent of the rule in this state), surely the failure to comply with some general safety order of the Industrial Accident Commission of which the employer may have had no notice would not constitute gross negligence. Section 66 of the act (St. 1913, p. 309), as in effect at the time of the injury, provided that every order of the commission should be admissible as evidence in any prosecution for the violation of certain provisions of the act, and that in every such prosecution they should be conclusively presumed to be reasonable and to fix reasonable and proper standards and requirements for safety. But by this section the orders are conclusively presumed to be reasonable only in prosecutions for violations of the act. The presumption does not apply to an action for damages instituted by an employé under section 12 (b). Furthermore these orders do not become effective until served upon the employer. Section 59. The record discloses that no service was made of any order upon defendants other than the oral instruction given to them by an employé of the Industrial Accident Commission on July 20th. As to this instruction it does not appear what time was given the employers to comply, and the reasonableness of the order having been directly put in issue by the allegations of the complaint of the necessity of equipping the machine with a certain safety device, and the court having found that such was not necessary, it must follow that the finding of the court upon the issue of gross negligence and willful disregard of the safety of the employé was proper, and that any other finding under the circumstances would have had no support in the evidence.

[5] Furthermore, appellant having waived his right to compensation afforded him by the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, and chosen to proceed in this action at law for damages, it was incumbent upon him to prove that the injury resulted both from the gross negligence (or willful misconduct) of respondents and from the willful disregard of the life, limb, or bodily safety of appellant. The willful disregard of the safety of an employé means something more than mere negligence or carelessness. To willfully disregard the safety of an employé is to intentionally do or fail to do something which contributes to the injury, having actual knowledge of the perils incident thereto, or having what in law is equivalent to such actual knowledge. The trial court found that respondents did not know that the machine was dangerous to operate without a safety device, and this finding is not attacked. Such being the case, the willful disregard of life, limb, or bodily safety, which is a necessary element to recovery in an action of this nature, was not shown.

The judgment is affirmed.

RAISCH et al. v. HELFRICH et al.
(Civ. 3337.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 14, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1920.)

1. Mechanics' liens §75(4) — "Constructive notice" of work sufficient to bind owner.

The knowledge on the part of an owner which will subject land to lien for improvements, is not alone actual knowledge; constructive notice—i. e., notice of circumstances which would put a prudent man on inquiry—being sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Constructive Notice.]

2. Mechanics' liens §78—Statute relating to estoppel against owner applies to street work.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1192, requiring owner to file notice of nonresponsibility to avoid a lien on land, applies to street work liens under section 1191.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. G. Raisch and Thomas A. Clark, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Raisch & Clark, against George Helfrich and the American Land & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Barrows, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. E. Manning, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the superior court foreclosing a lien for street work done under private contract. Plaintiffs, the contractors, secured the signature of defendant Helfrich to a written contract for the street work. Defendant Helfrich, or at least his wife, was at the time in possession under a written installment contract of purchase, under which the appellant company was selling the lot in question. After obtaining the signature of Helfrich to the street work contract, plaintiffs, at the suggestion of Helfrich, called upon the president and general manager of the appellant company, informing him of the contract with Helfrich and other property owners on the street, and of the nature and kind of the intended street work. The president and manager did not sign the contract, but expressed himself as pleased, and said "it was a fine thing to do, to have the street paved with asphalt, and to go ahead and do the work."

The street work was thereafter done according to the contract, was accepted, and in due time a notice of claim of lien was duly filed of record. Before this action was tried, the purchaser of the lot, Helfrich, defaulted in his payments, and the appellant retook the lot and became the owner thereof.

The action resulted in a judgment against appellant on the theory of the estoppel created by Code of Civil Procedure, § 1192, namely, on account of the owner's failure to file a notice of nonresponsibility.

[1] Appellant attacks the judgment on two grounds: First, that there was no evidence that it had knowledge that said work was being done at any time, but that the evidence only established that it knew the work was going to be done. The finding on this point is that appellant "had knowledge before, at, and during the course of the performance of the contract." We think the evidence sufficient. As was said in Harmon Lumber Co. v. Brown, 165 Cal. at page 197, 131 Pac. 368, at page 369:

"The knowledge which will subject the owner to this burden is not alone actual knowledge. Constructive knowledge, i. e., notice of circumstances which would put a prudent man on inquiry as to the fact in question (Civ. Code, § 19), is equally potent to bind the owner"—citing cases.

We think the evidence measures up well to this test.

[2] Appellant next contends that Code of Civil Procedure, § 1192, does not relate to street work. This section, as amended in 1911, reads:

"Every building or other improvement or work mentioned in any of the preceding sections of this chapter constructed, altered or repaired upon any land with the knowledge of the owner," etc.

Appellant draws attention with emphasis to the words "upon any land," and says that street work is not done on the land. He also cites Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Co. v. Lyons, 117 Cal. 212, 48 Pac. 1097, 59 Am. St. Rep. 174. This case was decided before Code of Civil Procedure, § 1192, was amended in 1911, and at that time it read:

"Every building or other improvement mentioned in section 1183 of this Code, constructed upon any lands with the knowledge of the owner," etc.

It is quite obvious that the Legislature by the amendment of 1911, by striking out "mentioned in section 1183 of this Code," and inserting "mentioned in any of the preceding sections of this chapter," intended to extend the operation of this statutory estoppel to street work liens under section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The construction contended for by appellant would violate the express language of the section as amended.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION
et al. (Civ. 3251.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §371—Accident "arising out of employment" within Compensation Act defined.

Accidents "arising out of the employment" within the Workmen's Compensation Act are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employé's work, or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employé, and they must result from a risk reasonably incident to the employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

2. Master and servant §371—Accident during vacation held not one "arising out of employment" within Compensation Act.

Where a sales' manager while spending his vacation at a ranch went by horseback to a post office to answer a military questionnaire, and was thrown from his horse and injured while riding over a trail in returning after writing and mailing a reply to a business letter from his employer received at the ranch, the injury was not the result of an accident arising out of his employment within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Proceedings by Grey M. Skidmore under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831) to obtain compensation for personal injuries, opposed by the Golden State Portland Cement Company, the employer, and the Continental Casualty Company, insurer. There was an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission and the Casualty Company brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Joe Crider, Jr., of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this proceeding upon writ of review we are asked to annul an award of compensation made by the Industrial Accident Commission to Grey M. Skidmore for injuries alleged to have been sustained while employed as sales manager by the Golden State Portland Cement Company, of which company petitioner was the insurer.

Petitioner attacks the award upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the commission that the injury to Skidmore as such employé arose out of and in the course of his employment.

In September, 1918, Skidmore, accompanied by his family, went from his home in Los Angeles county to a mountain ranch of a relative in Northern California, located some five miles from a railway station and post office, known as Island Mountain, to spend a week or more in hunting, horseback riding, and like diversion, as a vacation. He arrived at the ranch on September 25th, and on the two following days, free from any duties to his employer, engaged with marked success in hunting deer and other game abounding in the vicinity. On September 26th he received a letter from his employer, dated September 23d, pertaining to a request made by a customer for an adjustment of freight upon a bill of goods sold him, and which it was claimed Skidmore had agreed to grant, as to which Skidmore made reply the same day; but, having learned that some mail, among which was his questionnaire, awaited him at Island Mountain, he held this letter unsealed, and on the morning of September 27th, took his rifle, and, by horseback, following a trail representing a shorter route to the station and along which game was plentiful, went to Island Mountain, to which place his wife, accompanied by his uncle, proceeded in a vehicle over the road. Upon arriving at the station he received another letter from his employer, dated September 26th, containing information of general interest as to the progress of the business, but nothing calling for answer, though at the station, in finishing his letter in reply to that of September 23d, he made such comments and suggestions as might be expected from a sales manager on his vacation, referred to his success in hunting, and ended his letter by saying "am riding down to the station horseback 5 miles to fix up my questionnaire." After answering the questionnaire, he assisted his uncle in loading some grain and then went to his horse, which he mounted to return to the ranch, when he was thrown therefrom and his leg broken.

[1, 2] It thus appears that the accident occurred at a time when Skidmore was relieved from duty as an employé of the Golden State Portland Cement Company and while he was engaged in the diversions incidental to the vacation granted him, among which was horseback riding and hunting. His time was his own, to use as he pleased. His purpose in going to the station, as stated by him in his letter, was to answer his questionnaire. For his own diversion he went horseback, and, since deer were plentiful along the trail, he took his rifle. The mailing of the letter to his employer was a mere incident of the trip; but, conceding the writing and mailing of the letter was within the scope of his employment, he was not injured while engaged in such act, but afterwards, and when, upon his own time, free from any duties to his employer, he had engaged in the diversions of his vacation. Gernhardt et al. v. Industrial Accident Commission of California, 185 Pac. 307. He is no more entitled under the law to claim compensation from his employer for the injury which happened to him in thus returning to the ranch than he would have been had it occurred while he was traveling from his home in Los Angeles to the place where his vacation was to be spent. "The accidents arising out of the employment of the person injured are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employé's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employé. The accident must be one resulting from a risk reasonably incident to the employment." Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury et al., 172 Cal. 682, 158 Pac. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164. There was nothing in the nature of Skidmore's duties to his employer which required him to ride horseback over this trail, carrying a rifle, in traveling from the station back to the ranch; and hence it is impossible to trace the injury to the nature of the employé's work or the risks to which the employer's business exposed the employé as its sales manager. Ward v. Industrial Accident Commission, 175 Cal. 42, 164 Pac. 1123, L. R. A. 1918A, 233. The nature of his employment was not such as to expose him to the dangers incidental to the means adopted for his pleasure while on his vacation, and could not have been contemplated in connection with the employment. McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, 102 N. E. 697, L. R. A. 1916A, 306.

In our opinion, the injury sustained did not arise out of the employment, which fact must be made to appear in order to entitle an employé to compensation.

The award is annulled.

LOS ANGELES TRUST & SAVINGS BANK
v. BORTENSTEIN et al. (Civ. 3182.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 10, 1920.)

1. Conversion — Money awarded for land taken for public use deemed the land for purpose of discharging liens.

It is a well-recognized rule of equity based upon the doctrine of equitable conversion that, when land is taken for public use, the money awarded for such land remains, and is to be considered as land in respect to all rights and interests relating thereto, and the money, in such case, will be applied in equity to discharge the legal or equitable rights of creditors or incumbrancers in respect to such land.

2. Eminent domain — Damages for destruction of mortgaged property an equitable fund for satisfaction of mortgage.

Money recovered as damages by owner of mortgaged premises for destruction of the buildings thereon held a substitute for so much of the land as was destroyed in so far as mortgagee's rights were concerned, entitling mortgagee to recover, in foreclosure action, the difference between the value of the land and the amount of the mortgage; the money awarded being an equitable fund for the satisfaction of mortgage lien notwithstanding that it was awarded to owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank, against Herman Bortenstein and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Mack Love, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William L. Kuehn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on real property. Herman Bortenstein and the city of Los Angeles are defendants. Bortenstein alone appeals from the decree of foreclosure. The chief question on the appeal is whether plaintiff has any lien, legal or equitable, upon certain moneys that in another action were adjudged to be due from the city to Bortenstein for injury to the mortgaged property. Bortenstein filed a demurrer to the complaint in the present action. The demurrer was overruled, he was given ten days to answer, and, failing to answer, his default was entered. The city filed an answer admitting all the allegations of the complaint.

It appears from the complaint and recitals in the foreclosure decree that originally the mortgaged property, together with an adjoining strip of land ten feet wide, were owned by one Clarke and wife. The Clarkes, while the owners of the mortgaged property, mortgaged it to plaintiff to secure the payment of a promissory note for \$6,000 executed by them to plaintiff as the payee. Thereafter the Clarkes conveyed the mortgaged property to Bortenstein, subject to the mortgage. At the same time they conveyed to Bortenstein the adjoining ten-foot strip of land. Thereafter the mortgaged property, together with the buildings thereon, and the adjoining ten-foot strip, were greatly damaged by a flood. The buildings on the mortgaged property were carried off by the flood waters, and the surface of the land was washed away. Bortenstein, who had become the owner of the premises under his grant from the mortgagors, claiming that the city was responsible for the destructive effects of the flood, brought an action against the city wherein he recovered a judgment for damages. In that action Bortenstein sued not only for damage to the real property that the Clarkes had previously mortgaged to this plaintiff, but also for damage to the adjoining ten-foot strip and to certain personal property that was on the premises at the time of the flood. The judgment against the city was for the total sum of \$12,500. By its judgment in that action the court adjudged that the bare land itself, without the improvements, was damaged in the sum of \$1,500, that the buildings and improvements on the mortgaged property were damaged in the sum of \$10,000, and that the personal property was damaged in the sum of \$1,000. The plaintiff here was not a party to that action. By its decree of foreclosure in the present action the trial court found that the damage to the personal property and to the ten-foot strip is $\frac{229}{2500}$ of the total amount of damage to all the property so owned by Bortenstein and that the damage to the property covered by plaintiff's mortgage is $\frac{2271}{2500}$ of the total damage sustained by all the property. The court, therefore, by its decree in this foreclosure suit, adjudged: (1) That the mortgaged premises be sold by the sheriff in the manner prescribed by law; (2) that the sheriff apply the proceeds of such sale to the payment of his fees, to plaintiff's costs of suit, and to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt; (3) that if, after such payments, there be any surplus, he pay the same to Bortenstein; and (4) that if the proceeds of such sale be insufficient to satisfy the mortgage indebtedness, then, if and when said judgment against the city shall become final, the city pay to plaintiff the amount of such deficiency out of $\frac{2271}{2500}$ of the moneys that it had been adjudged to pay to Bortenstein; and that, if the judgment for damages in the action by Bortenstein against the city should be reversed on appeal, then, out of $\frac{2271}{2500}$ of any damages that might be awarded Bortenstein by any judgment that might thereafter become final in the action by him against the city, the latter pay plaintiff any deficiency there might be after such sheriff's sale of the mortgaged property.

Appellant makes no complaint of that part of the foreclosure decree which directs a sale of the mortgaged property. His attack is against that part of the decree which gives to plaintiff the right to satisfy the mortgage indebtedness out of any moneys recoverable from the city by reason of the partial destruction of the mortgaged property. There is no merit in this contention.

[1] If, by condemnation proceedings, the city had appropriated any part of the mortgaged property, it could not have cut off the lien of the mortgage by paying to Bortenstein, for the latter's sole use and benefit, damages for the part of the premises so appropriated. As a mortgagee, plaintiff could have claimed so much of such damages as might be necessary to satisfy the indebtedness secured by the mortgage, if the part of the mortgaged property not taken or damaged by the city should prove insufficient for that purpose. It is a well-recognized rule of equity, based upon the doctrine of equitable conversion, that when land is taken for public use, the money awarded for such lands remains, and is to be considered as, land in respect to all rights and interests relating thereto. The money, in such cases, is deemed to represent the land, and is applied in equity to discharge the liens upon it, precisely in accordance with the legal or equitable rights of creditors or incumbrancers in respect to such land. Bank of Auburn v. Roberts, 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 407; 19 R. C. L. p. 343; 88 Am. St. Rep. 363; Jones on Mortgages, § 708.

[2] In the instant case, though no part of the mortgaged property was actually appropriated by the city, the property by reason of the city's tortious acts, was partially destroyed or extinguished. The money awarded for this injury is an equitable fund for the satisfaction of plaintiff's lien on the mortgaged property, just as much so as if it had been money paid by the city for land taken or damaged in condemnation proceedings. It is a substitute for the land, or for that part thereof destroyed or damaged by the flood.

The fact that the money was awarded to Bortenstein does not change plaintiff's rights. The sum awarded to Bortenstein in his action against the city for damages arises from or grows out of the land, by reason of the injury that diminished its value. It is a fair inference from the averments of the complaint, the allegations of which are admitted by Bortenstein's default, that the damages awarded by the court in the action against the city were not limited to Bortenstein's interest, which was that of an owner of land subject to a mortgage, but covered all the damage done by the flood to the freehold. Therefore the money so awarded by the court as damages to the realty must be treated, in equity, as the land itself. It takes the place of the reduced value of the land. The mortgaged land, in its present damaged condition, together with such portion of all the moneys awarded for the total injury as represents the damage to the mortgaged premises, stand now in the place and stead of the original uninjured mortgaged premises. Bank of Auburn v. Roberts, supra; Id., 44 N. Y. 192.

Appellant relies confidently upon the doctrine announced in Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433, 87 Am. Dec. 90. There is nothing in that case that militates against the views we have expressed. In the present case the city caused damage to real property that Bortenstein's grantors had mortgaged to plaintiff. When the floods came the buildings on the mortgaged property were a part of the realty. The damage to the buildings, as well as to the land, was damage to the realty. The fact that, in the action against the city for damages, the court awarded Bortenstein $10,000 as and for damage to the buildings and improvements, does not detract from the fact that the damage so awarded was damage for injury to the freehold. In such cases the measure of damages is the value of the improvement as it was in place, as a part of the realty, immediately preceding the time when it was washed away or injured by the flood, not what it would sell for in the open market as personal property after its severance from the land. Rhoda v. Alameda County, 58 Cal. 357. In the Buckout Case the mortgagee was seeking to follow and impress with his mortgage lien the house that, by being served from the land, had become personalty. Here the mortgagee is but seeking to impress with its mortgage lien a fund that has taken the place of so much of the mortgaged realty as was destroyed by the flood.

The foreclosure decree makes no attempt to fasten upon appellant a personal liability for a deficiency judgment. The "deficiency" referred to in the decree is a deficiency that may remain after the sheriff's sale of the partially destroyed mortgaged premises, and that "deficiency," if any there may be, is to be made good out of so much of a fund as, in equity, is deemed to represent that part of the mortgaged property that was destroyed by the flood.

No other points made in the briefs require discussion. We have discussed the points upon which appellant's brief presents any argument. We find no error in the record.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte JOHNSON. (Cr. 511.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations — 120—Title of ordinance not conclusive.

The title of an ordinance is not conclusive as to its legal effect, and the court will look to the substantive provisions for determining that question.

2. Licenses — 6(3)—Ordinance imposing license tax on attorneys held a revenue measure.

An ordinance imposing a license tax on attorneys, though entitled "An ordinance providing for the licensing, regulating and carrying on of certain professions and trades," etc., held, in view of absence of regulatory provisions, a revenue measure, and hence not void as being regulatory and beyond the powers of the municipality.

3. Municipal corporations — 112(1)—Title is not an indispensable part of the ordinance.

The title is not an indispensable part of an ordinance, and it may have a defective title.

4. Municipal corporations — 111(4)—Failure to pay license fee being misdemeanor under general statute, validity of ordinance immaterial; "law."

An ordinance is deemed a law within Pen. Code, § 435, making failure to take out a license as required by law a misdemeanor, so that it is immaterial whether the provisions in an ordinance imposing license fee that failure shall be a misdemeanor be invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law.]

5. Constitutional law — 83(3)—Imprisonment for practicing law without license not "imprisonment for debt."

Where petitioner practiced law without first securing license as required by a municipal ordinance, his imprisonment for the misdemeanor committed was not an imprisonment for debt in violation of Const. art. 1; the imprisonment being deemed a punishment for failure to comply with a public duty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Imprisonment for Debt.]

6. Licenses — 6(3)—Municipality has power to impose a license fee.

While attorneys are licensed by the court, a municipality may impose a license fee on one carrying on the business of attorney and maintaining an office within city limits; for there is no distinction except degree between the protection, etc., necessary for one maintaining a law office and one running a mercantile establishment.

In the matter of the application of Waldo S. Johnson for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Marysville to secure release of petitioner after commitment for failure to pay license tax. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

M. T. Brittan, Waldo S. Johnson, and W. E. Davies, all of Marysville, for petitioner.
W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. The petitioner was convicted under section 1 of Ordinance No. 188 of the city of Marysville, and he seeks his discharge from the imprisonment which followed such conviction. Section 1 requires that every person carrying on certain specified callings shall, before commencing the same, procure a license therefor, and section 80, so far as pertinent to this inquiry, reads as follows:

"Section 80. Every person engaged in business as a lawyer, maintaining an office in said city, shall pay a license of $2.50 per month."

The petitioner, a lawyer by occupation, maintains an office in said city, and he neglected to take out the license demanded by said section 1. No point is made as to sufficiency of the judgment in mere matters of form.

[1-3] 1. It is contended that the ordinance in question is regulatory in its nature, and therefore beyond the powers of the municipality. It is conceded that the business in question is not one that can be "regulated" under the police powers of cities and counties. Unless, therefore, the ordinance is a revenue measure, it cannot be upheld. The title of the ordinance is cited to the court as an evidence that the municipality, in adopting the ordinance intended it as a regulatory provision. The title reads: "An ordinance providing for licensing and regulating the carrying on of certain professions, trades, callings and occupations." It is true that this title contains the word "regulating," but this is not conclusive. The court will look to the substantive provisions of the ordinance to determine its legal effect. It happens that this title is copied in precise words from that considered by the court in Ex parte Braun, 141 Cal. 204, 74 Pac. 780. The court, in arriving at the conclusion that the ordinance considered in that case was for revenue and not for regulation, uses the following language:

"It is devoid of regulating provisions, being devoted entirely to the imposition of a license tax upon various trades and occupations and the collection thereof. It imposes a license tax upon a great majority of callings and occupations, and in several instances the amount of the tax is based upon the amount of business transacted. It includes numerous callings which are in no degree subject to regulation. * * * Taking into consideration the absence of regulatory provisions, the amounts of the several taxes imposed, and the nature of many of the subjects of taxation named in the ordinance, including the particular business here involved, it is very clear that the license tax upon the business alleged to be conducted by petitioner was imposed solely for the purpose of raising revenue."

The language just quoted is peculiarly applicable to the ordinance now under examination. Although two justices dissented from the opinion in that case, their dissent was based upon other points. The case has been often cited in later reports and, so far as we are informed, its doctrines have never been questioned. A title is not an indispensable part of an ordinance. It may have a defective title. Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527; Ex parte Young, 154 Cal. 321, 97 Pac. 822, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 330. It clearly appears that the ordinance in question is a revenue measure.

[4] 2. The petitioner insists that the city has no power to provide that a violation of the ordinance shall constitute a misdemeanor. It is immaterial whether or not it has such power or has attempted unsuccessfully to exercise it. An ordinance is deemed to be "a law" in this state. Section 435 of the Penal Code provides that a failure to take out a license when required by a law of this state shall constitute a misdemeanor. This section covers a violation of an ordinance. Ex parte Lawrence, 69 Cal. 608, 11 Pac. 217; Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 211, 24 Pac. 747.

[5] It is further insisted in the brief of petitioner that imprisonment on conviction for nonpayment of a license tax is an imprisonment for debt, and therefore unlawful, though no authorities are cited in support of this claim. It has been so long conceded in this state that imprisonment for failure to pay a license tax is not an imprisonment for debt within the meaning of article 1 of the Constitution that the question can scarcely be deemed to be open for discussion. Failure to procure a license in a case required by law is a neglect of a duty due to the public. For such neglect the offender may be punished by imprisonment. In such case the punishment is penal, and not merely in the nature of a remedy. It is not auxiliary to a civil action. Even after the offender shall have suffered the specified number of days' imprisonment, the money obligation is still unpaid. The penalty imposed is a mere punitive burden exacted as a means of deterring the offender and others from the commission of like delinquencies in the future. In Ex parte Bagshaw, 152 Cal. 701, 93 Pac. 864, the court, through its Chief Justice, uses the following language:

"The Legislature of the state has seen fit to make it a crime under the state law for any one to carry on a business for which a license is required by any law or ordinance, without procuring such license, and one who does so not only disobeys the ordinance, but violates the state law, and is guilty of a crime by reason of the express provision of such law."

The petitioner is not charged with a failure to pay his license tax. The charge is that he carried on a certain business without first procuring the necessary license. The section of the Penal Code above cited does not purport to fix a license fee nor does it provide for the issuance of a license. It would be unprofitable to multiply authorities to show that our courts have again and again upheld the power of the Legislature to prescribe a punishment for failure to procure a license before carrying on certain lines of business.

[6] 3. The chief claim of the petitioner is that the city has no power to license the business of a lawyer. It is pointed out that a lawyer is licensed as such by the courts, that his license is in the nature of a vested right, and that any act of the Legislature curtailing this right would impair the obligation of a contract. Without conceding that these claims are well founded, they are, nevertheless, inapplicable to the case. It is true that a license cannot be imposed upon a lawyer, nor can his business be regulated by ordinance. But the petitioner is not charged with practicing law without a license, but with "carrying on a trade, calling, profession, or business" without first procuring a license. Sections 1 and 4 of the ordinance, when read in connection with section 80, above quoted, show clearly that the license is exacted for "carrying on the business of a lawyer at a fixed place of business." The propriety of exacting revenue from one who maintains an office and carries on a business within a city is apparent. Many expenditures by the city are rendered necessary by reason of an office or other place of business within its limits. Petitioner relies with much confidence upon City of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674. This case, however, is not in point. The defendant, Curtin, was charged with failure to pay a license tax under an ordinance which provided that "every lawyer shall pay a license of three dollars per quarter." It was held in that case that a license tax cannot be levied upon a person nor upon such of his acts as fall short of carrying on a business. The distinction was sharply drawn by the court between a license upon the business of practicing law and a license upon a person because he is an attorney at law. There appears to be no inherent difference between carrying on the business of practicing law and carrying on any other business or pursuit. It is not questioned that the state may, in the exercise of its sovereign powers, levy license taxes upon merchants and manufacturers who maintain places of business, and this, too, for the sole purpose of raising revenue. A lawyer's office makes certain demands upon the various fire, police, street, and other functions of a city, which differ from above classes only in quantity, and not in quality. If the one should be required to assist in keeping up the revenues of a city, no reason is apparent why the other should not. Whether a license might be enacted for carrying on a law business without maintaining an office is a question that is not before the court. We entertain no doubt that a state license issued to a lawyer authorizing him to practice law is not a bar to the claim of a city to levy a license for maintaining an office in connection with such practice. For many years the state has licensed druggists, but it has not been suggested that a druggist's license is the equivalent of a license to run a drug store. No adequate reason is discovered why the commitment should be disturbed.

Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 963, a separate appeal does not lie from an order denying a new trial.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1041(2)—Defendant held not prejudiced by leave to plaintiffs to amend.

Where defendant did not object to plaintiff's having leave to amend by adding another party plaintiff, and was offered by the court further time to answer, which his counsel refused, he was not prejudiced by plaintiff's permission to amend.

3. Trover and conversion $\S$ 40(1)—Circumstantial evidence of receipt and conversion admissible.

Circumstantial evidence may be competent to support findings as to receipt and conversion of plaintiff's goods by defendant.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the evidence was conflicting, the trial court's determination whether plaintiff produced the preponderance of evidence is final; the decision being as to facts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by M. J. Bhumgara and another against J. Gazvini. From a judgment for plaintiffs and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals. Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

W. R. Law, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. [1] Plaintiff M. J. Bhungara sued to recover an amount of money alleged to be the value of certain goods, wares, and merchandise. The property is asserted to have been converted by the defendant to his own use. Judgment was in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals therefrom. An appeal was also attempted to be taken from an order denying a motion for new trial, but under the Code provision in force at the time that motion was made and ruled upon no separate appeal was authorized to be taken from the order. Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

[2] At the trial the plaintiff asked and obtained leave to amend his complaint by adding the name of J. S. Bhungara as party plaintiff. Appellant now claims that the granting of this permission was error. An examination of the record shows that appellant did not object to the amendment at the time. It is shown that the court offered to allow further time to answer, if appellant desired, after the amendment adding the name of the party was made, but that appellant's counsel replied that he did not care for any time, and, at his suggestion, it was stipulated by respondent that, "if the defense is good against either one, it is good against both." We cannot perceive how in the slightest degree the appellant was prejudiced by the amendment.

[3, 4] The only other claim is that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the court as to the receipt of plaintiffs' goods by defendant and their alleged conversion. We have examined the transcript of the evidence with much care, and, without entering into a detailed statement of the testimony, we consider that the evidence was sufficient to fully sustain the findings. Some of the evidence was circumstantial, but it was none the less competent and material. It was for the trial court to determine whether plaintiffs produced the preponderance of evidence, and its decision, in the presence of a conflict, is final as to the facts.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed.

The judgment is affirmed.

TULARE COUNTY v. FENN. (Civ. 2937.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 8, 1920.)

Bail  96—Cash bail to answer felony charged forfeited by recorder belongs to county.

A city recorder, in forfeiting a cash bail taken under authority of Pen. Code, §§ 1268, 1295, for the appearance of defendant charged with felony, acts as a magistrate under the power given by Pen. Code, § 808, and Municipal Corporation Act, §§ 882, 883, not as a judge of recorder's court, so that the amount forfeited is not payable to the city under Pen. Code, §§ 1457, 1570, requiring payment of forfeitures in police or justice courts of the city into the city treasury, even though they are for violation of a state law, but such money must be paid to the county under Pen. Code, § 1307.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by County of Tulare against R. W. Fenn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Braswell, of Lindsay, and Middlecoff & Feemster, of Visalia, for appellant.

Fred C. Scott, Dist. Atty., of Visalia (Frank Lamberson, of Visalia, of counsel), for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In December, 1917, while the defendant was acting as a magistrate of the county of Tulare under and by virtue of his office as recorder of the city of Lindsay in that county (said city of Lindsay being a city of the sixth class), he received a complaint in writing made to him as such magistrate, charging one Ah Wong with the commission of a felony. Such proceedings were had that said magistrate received from the said Ah Wong the sum of $500 as bail and undertaking that the said Ah Wong would appear, etc., as required. At the time set for the examination of Ah Wong before the defendant upon said charge of felony Ah Wong did not appear. Thereupon the said Fenn, acting as magistrate, entered the fact of such nonappearance upon the minutes of the recorder's court of the city of Lindsay, and did declare said sum of $500 to be forfeited by the said Ah Wong. That forfeiture has become final; nevertheless, the defendant has not paid said sum to the treasurer of the county of Tulare. On these facts, which are pleaded more fully in the complaint, the county of Tulare brought this action to recover judgment against the defendant for said sum of $500. By his answer to the complaint the defendant admitted the allegations of the complaint, except that the defendant denied that there is due, owing, and unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiff the said sum, or any sum whatever. An affirmative defense was also pleaded, under which it was claimed that the money forfeited as aforesaid was forfeited to the city of Lindsay, and not to the county of Tulare, and the money paid over to the said city of Lindsay. On the pleadings above mentioned, the plaintiff moved for a judgment on the pleadings. Said motion having been granted, judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

In support of the plaintiff's claim of right to the money in question, we are first required to consider certain sections of the Penal Code in the chapter which relates to the taking of bail. "Admission to bail is the order of a competent court or magistrate that the defendant be discharged from actual custody upon bail." Pen. Code, § 1268. Section 1295 permits the deposit of money instead of an undertaking in writing. Section 1307 reads as follows:

"If, by reason of the neglect of the defendant to appear, money deposited instead of bail is forfeited, and the forfeiture is not discharged or remitted, the clerk with whom it is deposited must, at the end of thirty days, unless the court has before that time discharged the forfeiture, pay over the money deposited to the county treasurer."

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1307 of the Penal Code, appellant contends that the money deposited with him by Ah Wong was rightfully forfeited to the city of Lindsay under and by virtue of the provisions of section 1457 of the Penal Code, which section is a part of the chapter entitled "Proceedings in Justices' and Police Courts," being chapter 1 of title 11 of part 2 of that Code. It is provided in that section "that all fines and forfeitures collected in any police court or city justice's court that is maintained, and the salaries of the officers thereof paid by the city, whether prosecuted for a violation of a state law or a city ordinance shall be paid to the city treasurer of the city in which such court is located." See, also, section 1570, Penal Code, to like effect. It is conceded that defendant's salary as recorder was payable by the city of Lindsay.

The money in question here was not payable to the city treasurer of the city of Lindsay, unless as a forfeiture it was collected in the recorder's court in its character as a police court and in connection with an action prosecuted therein. But it was not so collected. The recorder's court in a city of the sixth class has jurisdiction concurrently with justices' courts "of all actions and proceedings, civil and criminal, arising within the corporate limits of such city or town, and which might be tried in such justice's court." The recorder is judge of the recorder's court, and it is provided that he "shall have the powers and perform the duties of a magistrate." Municipal Corporations Act, §§ 882, 883; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1915 Ed., p. 1132. "A magistrate is an officer having power to issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with a public offense." Pen. Code, § 807. "The following persons are magistrates: 1. The Justices of the Supreme Court; 2. The judges of the superior court; 3. Justices of the peace; (4) Police magistrates in towns or cities." Pen. Code, § 808.

Since the charge on which Ah Wong was held under arrest was not for a misdemeanor triable in the recorder's court, but was a charge of felony, the defendant Fenn could not act in that matter except as a magistrate. The power of justices of the peace and police judges to hold examinations and commit persons to be held on charges of felony or misdemeanor triable in the superior court is derived from the character of those officers as magistrates, and not as justices of the peace or judges of police courts. "This office of magistrate is purely a statutory one, "and the powers and duties of the functionary are solely those given by statute." People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 74, 78, 50 Pac. 20, 21; People v. Crespi, 115 Cal. 50, 46 Pac. 863. Even a justice of the Supreme Court, or a judge of the superior court, if he sees fit to assume the duties of a committing magistrate, "is not accompanied in the discharge of those functions by any of the general or implied powers * * * which surround him when sitting as a judge of a court of record." People v. Cohen, supra.

In acting as custodian of bail money, and in paying out such money to the public treasury after the forfeiture, the magistrate is an agent of the state, not acting in a judicial capacity. Therefore the decisions referred to by counsel for appellant, to the effect that a judge is not to be held responsible in a civil suit for any judicial determination made by him, are not applicable to this case. The defendant is liable to the county, in an action prosecuted by the district attorney, for money held by defendant which is by law payable into the treasury of the county. It is immaterial to the plaintiff's cause of action that the defendant has mistakenly paid out that money, even in good faith, to some other person or corporation.

The judgment is affirmed.

HATFIELD v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.
(S. F. 9504.)

States  116—Act providing for bond issue held unconstitutional for failure to make proper provision for payment of principal.

St. 1919, p. 1182, providing for a $10,000,000 bond issue, and for maturity of first lot of bonds on January 2, 1931, but making no provision for the creation of a fund available for the payment of any principal until the 1st day of February, 1931, held void, under Const. art. 16, for failure to provide ways and means for payment of the principal, and to create a sinking fund for payment of principal, to commence at a time after the incurring of such debt of not more than a period of one-quarter of the time of maturity of such debt.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by George J. Hatfield against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, to require him to comply with the provisions of an act for the issuance of bonds in furtherance of the Land Settlement Act. On demurrer to petition. Alternative writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Milton D. Sapiro, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Gregory & Goodell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in mandate. An alternative writ was issued, and the matter has been submitted for decision on a demurrer to the petition.

The proceeding involves the question of the validity of an act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to provide for the issuance and sale of state bonds to create a fund to carry out the objects of an act entitled 'An act creating a state land settlement board and defining its powers and duties and making an appropriation in aid of its operations,' approved June 1, 1917, and any and all acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto; to create a sinking fund for the payment of said bonds; to define the duties of said officers in relation thereto; to appropriate money for the expense of printing and advertising the sale of said bonds; and to provide for the submission of this act to a vote of the people," approved May 27, 1919. Stats. 1919, p. 1182.

The act is one authorizing a bonded indebtedness of $10,000,000, and therefore, under article 16 of the Constitution, can take effect only in the event that it is submitted to the people at a general election and receives "a majority of all the votes cast for and against it at such election." By the act it is provided that the secretary of state shall publish the act at the expense of the state in at least one newspaper in each county or city and county throughout the state for three months preceding the next general election. Claiming that the act is invalid for want of compliance with certain requirements of article 16 of the Constitution, the secretary of state has refused to make such publication and states that he will not make the same. Hence this proceeding.

Article 16 of the Constitution substantially provides that the Legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall, singly or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of $300,000, except in certain instances not material here,

"unless the same shall be authorized by law for some single object or work to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans, for the payment of the interest of such debt or liability as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal of such debt or liability within seventy-five years of the time of the contracting thereof." (Italics are ours.)

It further provides that such law shall be irrepealable until the principal and interest shall be paid and discharged, and also that—

"Such law may make provision for a sinking fund to pay the principal of such debt or liability to commence at a time after the incurring of such debt or liability of not more than a period of one-fourth of the time of maturity of such debt or liability."

In view of these provisions it is essential to the validity of the proposed law submitted to the people for ratification that it (the proposed law) "shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans," for the payment of principal and interest as the same falls due, with a limitation of 75 years as the maximum period for which the indebtedness may be created. All this, as we understand it, is conceded by petitioner. Such provision as to the principal may, and perhaps must, be made by providing such a sinking fund as is described in the article, and by this law no other method is attempted. The claim of respondent is that the proposed law does not purport to provide "ways and means" to pay either all of the interest as it falls due, or all of the principal as it falls due. As already suggested, the only provisions therein as to the source of any such payments are those with relation to a sinking fund, thereby provided for, from which all such payments are to be made. It is also claimed that such adequate provision as to a sinking fund for the payment of the principal as is required by article 16 is not made, in that the same is not made to commence at a time after the incurring of the debt "of not more than a period of one-fourth of the time of maturity of such debt or liability." Full consideration of the matter forces us to the conclusion that the objections of respondent are in part, at least, well based, with the result that the proposed law must be held violative of article 16 of the Constitution.

The bonds authorized, aggregating in number 32,000, and in amount $10,000,000, are to bear date January 2, 1921, and to bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, except that the first payment of interest is to be made on January 2, 1922, on so many of said bonds as are theretofore sold. They are to be sold at auction in such parcels and numbers as directed by the Governor, on request of the land settlement board, the state treasurer detaching from bonds sold all interest coupons which have matured before the day of sale, and the purchaser paying any interest already accrued on any remaining coupon. The first 800 of said bonds, aggregating $250,000, mature and are payable January 2, 1931; the second $250,000 of said bonds mature and are payable January 2, 1932; the third $250,000 on January 2, 1933; and so on each year to January 2, 1971.

As to the sinking fund the act provides:

"For the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds a sinking fund, to be known and designated as the 'land settlement sinking fund' shall be, and the same is hereby created as follows, to wit: The state treasurer, after the second day of January, 1931 [italics ours], shall, on the first day of each and every month thereafter, after the sale of said bonds, take from the land settlement fund [a fund provided by the Land Settlement Act of June 1, 1917 (Stat. 1917, p. 1566), as amended May 23, 1919 (Stat. 1919, p. 838)] such sum as, multiplied by the time in months, the bonds then sold and outstanding have to run, will equal the principal of the bonds sold and outstanding at the time said treasurer shall so take said sum from said land settlement fund, less the amount theretofore taken therefrom for said purpose, and he shall place the sum in the land settlement sinking fund created by this act." Section 5.

It was further provided:

"And to provide means for the payment of interest on the bonds that may be sold and outstanding, said treasurer shall monthly take from the land settlement fund, and pay into said land settlement [sinking] fund, an amount equal to the monthly interest then due on all bonds then sold, delivered and outstanding."

Payments of interest and principal are to be made from this sinking fund. These are the only provisions in the proposed law relating to the sinking fund, except a provision to the effect that, where a purchaser of a bond pays a sum as accrued interest, the amount shall be paid into the land settlement sinking fund for the purpose, of course, of being paid out again on the interest coupon when it matures and is presented.

It may be conceded that sufficient provision is made by the proposed law for the payment of interest on the bonds sold as it falls due; the treasurer being expressly required to take monthly from the land settlement fund and pay into the land settlement sinking fund an amount equal to the monthly interest then due on all bonds then sold, delivered and outstanding. Although not clearly expressed, this provision may perhaps be construed as requiring such action by the treasurer each month after the sale and delivery of the first bonds disposed of, instead of waiting until January 2, 1931. However, this may be, it seems perfectly clear that the act does not provide ways and means for the payment of the first $250,000 principal of the bonds which mature and are payable January 2, 1931. As we have seen, the only attempted provision is by way of the sinking fund created by the act. There is no provision whatever for the putting into that fund of any money available for the payment of any principal whatever until the 1st day of February, 1931, while the first $250,000 of the bonds mature January 2, 1931. It is not until February 1, 1931, that the treasurer is authorized to begin taking from the land settlement fund on the 1st day of each and every month and placing in the sinking fund money to be kept and used for the payment of the principal. Moreover, the sinking fund must be such as is specified in the constitutional provision, which plainly requires that the same shall "commence at a time after the incurring of the indebtedness of not more than a period of one-fourth of the time of maturity of such debt or liability." This, of course, means that the actual placing of money to the credit of the sinking fund for the payment of principal shall commence at the time stated, and doubtless it also contemplates that the provision so made shall be adequate to the full payment of principal as it falls due. Assuming that the bonds will all be at once sold, as we must in determining the validity of the act, it is obvious that as to all bonds maturing on and before January 2, 1931, the sinking fund does not "commence at a time after the incurring of the indebtedness of not more than a period of one-fourth of the time of maturity of such debt or liability." A simple calculation will show that this means that, as to $7,750,000 of the $10,000,000, the sinking fund does not "commence" at as early a date as is required in view of the constitutional provision. We can see no escape from the conclusion that the act must be held invalid for the reason that it does not measure up to the requirements of article 16 of the Constitution.

It has seemed to us quite possible that the specification of the date of "the second day of January, 1931," in section 5 of the act, was inadvertently made, and that "the second day of January, 1921," was really intended. To guard against any possible error in the printed volume of statutes, we obtained from the office of the secretary of state a certified copy of the enrolled bill as approved by the Governor, and find that the act is correctly set forth in the published statutes. It is hardly necessary to say that we have no power to make any change in the provisions of the act, and that we must accept it as truly expressing the intent of the Legislature.

The alternative writ of mandamus heretofore issued is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

STRAUS v. EATON et al. (Civ. 2949.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Frauds, statute of §115(3)—Paper route lease signed only by lessor's wife held binding on lessee as the party to be charged.

Though a lease of a paper route was void as to the lessor under the statute because his name was signed only by his wife, lessee in a suit on his bond for performance thereof is, as to the contract, "the party to be charged" for newspapers furnished by lessor, and for which in the lease lessee promised to pay, and the contract as signed by lessee is binding on him, and furnishes a sufficient consideration for his bond for performance of the contract, and establishes the liability of both him and his sureties.

2. Husband and wife §23—Parol authorization to wife to assign claim under lease of newspaper route held valid.

Where the owner of a newspaper route orally authorized his wife to lease it to defendant, telling her that he could not attend to the business of defendant, and that she would have to look after the lease matter and attend to the business, such authority held broad enough to empower her to collect the amount due, and incidentally to assign the claim if necessary or convenient, in view of Civ. Code, § 954, providing that a thing in action arising out of an action may be transferred by the owner.

3. Pleading §218(3)—On demurrer plaintiff should have been required to specify number of articles furnished for which claim was made.

In an action for an amount due by the lessee of a newspaper route to lessor's assignee, where the complaint alleged that lessor furnished papers to lessee under the terms, and during the continuation of their agreement and upon the price therein stated, in a certain sum, when defendants demurred under ground of uncertainty as to the number of papers delivered, plaintiff should have been required to state such number.

4. Contracts §322(5)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain verdict for balance due under lease of newspaper route.

In an action for a balance due under a lease of a newspaper route, evidence as to the number of papers delivered and for which defendant was liable held not to sustain a finding for plaintiff in the amount found by the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by B. A. Straus against J. B. Eaton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. T. Kendrick, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

B. F. Woodard, of Los Angeles, and A. W. Hare, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. On the 1st day of August, 1914, one A. V. Dunsmoor was the owner of a newspaper route of the Los Angeles Daily Times, covering certain territory in Glendale, Cal. The complaint alleges that on that day Dunsmoor entered into an agreement with defendant Eaton. By the terms of that agreement, as shown in the complaint, Dunsmoor leased to Eaton the described territory of the city carrier service of the Los Angeles Times, for a period of two years from the date of the writing, August 1, 1914. This writing was signed by the defendant J. B. Eaton, and also was signed, "A. V. Dunsmoor, by Anna A. Dunsmoor," but was not signed by A. V. Dunsmoor. On the same day, defendant Eaton as principal and the other two defendants as sureties executed to A. V. Dunsmoor a bond in the sum of $1,000, conditioned for the performance by Eaton of the terms of said contract. In the alleged contract it was provided that Dunsmoor would furnish papers to Eaton, and that Eaton would pay Dunsmoor therefor at the rate of $1.40 per hundred copies. This action was brought to recover an unpaid balance alleged to be due for papers delivered to Eaton under that contract. Judgment was entered against the defendants in the sum of $924.35. On motion for new trial, the court ordered that the motion be granted, unless the plaintiff consented to a reduction of the amount of the judgment to the sum of $716.89. The plaintiff filed written consent to such reduction. The defendants appeal from the judgment.

[1] The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and on account of sundry uncertainties in the complaint, including the point that the complaint did not show the number of copies of the newspaper that were received by Eaton from Dunsmoor for service on the route mentioned in the complaint. These demurrers were overruled. Appellants claim that the purported contract was invalid because it was not signed by A. V. Dunsmoor, nor by any person having written authorization from him. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 1, and section 2309. It is true that in the complaint it was not alleged that Anna A. Dunsmoor had received any authority in writing from A. V. Dunsmoor to enter into a contract for him or in his name. And at the trial of the action the only attempt on the part of the plaintiff to establish such agency is found in the testimony of Mrs. Dunsmoor that she is the wife of A. V. Dunsmoor, and that prior to August 1, 1914, he told her that he could not attend to the business with Eaton, and that she would have to look after the lease matter and attend to the business. But it is likewise a fact that the defendant Eaton received from

A. V. Dunsmoor a large number of the newspapers for which, in the written instrument signed by him, he had promised to pay, and that in this action Eaton is, as to the contract, "the party to be charged" thereon. Harper v. Goldschmidt, 156 Cal. 245, 104 Pac. 451, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 689, 134 Am. St. Rep. 124. In that decision the court quoted Chitty on Contracts, where it was said that the reason why a party may sue on a contract although it may be void against him for want of his signature under the statute of frauds is that the signature is prescribed as "necessary evidence of a contract," and not as an essential or constituent part of the engagement itself. Under the law as thus defined, we think that the contract, as signed by Eaton, was binding upon him. This being so, it furnished a sufficient consideration for the bond, and thus establishes the liability of the sureties on the bond, as well as that of their principal.

[2] Appellant contends also that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the claim was assigned by A. V. Dunsmoor to the plaintiff. Section 954, Civil Code, provides generally that a thing in action arising out of an obligation may be transferred by the owner. It is only in particular instances, as in claims for wages or salary, that the assignment must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 955. So A. V. Dunsmoor could have made an oral assignment of the indebtedness sued on herein. Therefore he could orally authorize an agent to make the assignment in his behalf. We think that the authorization of Mrs. Dunsmoor, as shown by her testimony, was broad enough to give her power to collect the amount due, and incidentally to assign the claim if in the exercise of her discretion as agent she found such assignment to be necessary or convenient.

[3] The complaint did not show the number of copies delivered. It was only alleged that Dunsmoor furnished papers to Eaton "under the terms of said agreement and during the continuance of said agreement, and upon the price therein stated, in the sum of $1,249.45"; that no part of said sum has been paid, except, etc. When the defendants demurred on the ground of uncertainty directed to this point, plaintiff should have been required to state the number of papers delivered. While this might be regarded as an unimportant error if there were no other objections to the judgment, we rule upon this point so that the error may be corrected if the matter shall be again presented in the court below.

[4] On the evidence introduced, and about which there is no dispute, the amount of the judgment is in excess of the amount due. It was stipulated that the items set out in the bill of particulars correctly show the number and character of the papers furnished. The total number shown, including 4,119 Sunday papers, is 55,326, which at the rate specified in the agreement would amount to $774.56. The complaint admits that $325.10 of the amount due for the papers furnished has been paid. It follows that the findings, with respect to the amount due and unpaid, are not sustained by the evidence. For that reason the judgment is reversed.

Ex parte BAYLES. (Cr. 913.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California, May 18, 1920.)

Larceny ⇐ 3(3)—Taking property to enforce lien not "grand larceny," though wrongful.

Where tenant in apartment house agreed that landlord would have a lien on unpaid charges, and also agreed that he would leave the apartment clean on vacating it or pay for cleaning it, action of landlord in seizing articles of tenant because apartment was not left clean could not be grand larceny under Pen. Code, § 484, defining that offense as the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the property of another without his consent, as whether it was clean was a disputed question which must be tried in civil action, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 3336, 3379, 3380, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 509-512, 667, 870.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Grand Larceny.]

Application of Hazel Bayles for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from Chief of Police of City and County of San Francisco. Petitioner discharged.

C. F. Adams, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Leo R. Friedman, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This case comes to us upon a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The petition alleges that the petitioner is and was at all times mentioned therein the owner and manager of a certain furnished apartment house in San Francisco; that the prosecuting witness, P. Tucker, rented an apartment in said house; that, at the request of said Tucker, petitioner furnished gas and electricity to him from February 16, 1920, to March 31, 1920; that at the time of renting said apartment, Tucker signed a receipt, agreeing to the terms and conditions set forth on the back thereof, one of which was that the price of gas and electricity should be charged for in addition to the price agreed upon as the rental of the apartment. Another one of the terms and conditions contained in said agreement attached to the petition is as follows:

"I,, also agree to leave the said apartment, the linen and bedding therein, clean and in good condition, or to pay the charges for cleaning and laundering the same; if said rent or any part thereof, or any charge hereunder, remain unpaid after the same becomes due, according to the terms hereof, or if any obligation hereunder remains unperformed," the owner may remove the personal property of the tenant, and after three months may sell the same at public auction, etc.

It is alleged in the petition that the apartment was vacated by Tucker on March 31, 1920, and was not left clean, and that petitioner was obliged to clean the same; that petitioner charged Tucker $3 for cleaning said apartment; also that a blanket and comforter used by Tucker in said apartment were left soiled, and a charge of $1.50 was made by petitioner for cleaning the same, which charges Tucker refused to pay; that the petitioner on said 31st day of March did take and carry away one sewing machine and one victrola of the value of $225, the property of said Tucker, and refused to permit said Tucker to have the same, and claimed to hold said property for a lien of $9.75, which amount included the charge for gas and electricity, breakage of chinaware, etc., cleaning of linens, blankets, etc., and the charge of $3 for cleaning of the apartment. Upon April 2, 1920, Tucker swore to a complaint in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, charging petitioner with the crime of grand larceny. A warrant was issued upon said complaint, and on April 5th petitioner was arrested. The hearing came on regularly on April 21, 1920, and upon said hearing the judge of the police court made an order holding the defendant to answer to the superior court upon the charge. Petitioner contends that the testimony before the committing magistrate shows no reasonable, probable or lawful cause for holding her to answer to the superior court for the offense of grand larceny. The precise contention of petitioner is that the transcript of the testimony shows no felonious intent upon her part.

The testimony in the police court shows that Tucker offered to pay the charges for gas and electricity, breakage, etc., and refused to pay only the charges for cleaning the apartment. The first question presented, therefore, is whether or not petitioner had a lien upon the property for this charge. Section 1861a, Civil Code, as added by St. 1917, p. 1662, provides:

"Keepers of furnished apartment houses shall have a lien upon the baggage and other property of value belonging to their tenants or guests, which may be in such furnished apartment house, for the proper charges due from such tenants or guests for their accommodation, rent, services, meals and such extras as are furnished at their request. * * *

It becomes unnecessary in this instance to decide whether the charge for cleaning the apartment and blankets at the end of the tenancy was a "proper" charge within the meaning of the statute, for the reason that Tucker himself agreed to what should be proper charges against him in his renting agreement. As before stated, in this agreement he undertook to leave the apartment "clean" upon vacating it, or to pay for cleaning the same; and he agreed that the owner should have a lien upon his personal property for all unpaid charges under the agreement between them. Whether or not the apartment was "clean" when it was vacated, was a disputed matter, as shown by the testimony. "Clean" is a difficult word to define absolutely; it is a relative term. Its meaning to its users varies with the standards of such users; and it has a different significance in its relation to different objects. Mr. Tucker contends the apartment was left as "clean" as it was when he received it. Mrs. Bayles contends that her apartments have a reputation for being always "absolutely sanitary and immaculate," and that the apartment was not "clean" according to that standard, but that the services of a man were required for three days to clean the kitchen alone. However, this delicate question of fact does not fall to our lot for determination. If Mrs. Bayles was entitled to hold these articles until she was paid the price of cleaning the apartment, provided said apartment was not sufficiently cleaned before being vacated, then a dispute over the condition of the apartment would not so change the petitioner's legal position as to make her guilty of grand larceny in holding possession of the property under a claim of lien which would exist if she proved her contention about the uncleanness of the apartment. For, even though the standard of cleanliness exacted by the petitioner should be found by the jury to be an unreasonable standard, and not the standard contemplated by the agreement between the parties, yet we think petitioner would not be guilty of grand larceny. The record discloses no evil or felonious intent upon the part of the petitioner; she was merely seeking to enforce her civil rights as she believed them to exist. Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another. Section 484, Pen. Code. Every taking by one person of the personal property of another without his consent is not larceny. Felonious intent is of the essence of the crime of larceny. People v. Devine, 95 Cal. 227, 30 Pac. 378. If a jury should determine that the apartment was clean according to the standard contemplated by the parties at the time they made their agreement, at the time petitioner took possession of the goods, and that therefore no money was due petitioner for cleaning the same, Mr. Tucker could be amply compensated in damages for the wrongful detention of his property. Section 667, Code Civ. Proc., and section 3336, Civ. Code. But this question must be tried out in a civil action, and not in a criminal proceeding. Section 3379, Civ. Code; section 3380, Civ. Code; sections 870, 509, 510, 511, and 512, Code Civ. Proc.

The petitioner is discharged.

WILLIAMS v. A. R. G. BUS CO. (Civ. 3439.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1920.)

1. Damages ☞131(4)—$1,500 not excessive for shock and injuries from automobile accident.

$1,500 held not excessive damages for one injured by automobile bus overturning, where his back was wrenched and his nervous system shocked and he was unable to resume his work for six weeks.

2. Appeal and error ☞1004(1)—Grounds for setting award aside as excessive stated.

The power of an appellate court over excessive damages exists only when the facts are such that the excess appears as a matter of law or is such as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury.

3. Appeal and error ☞295—Excessiveness of damages reviewable only if raised by motion for new trial.

If defendant appellant in personal injury action considered verdict for plaintiff the result of passion or prejudice, its remedy lay first in a motion for new trial addressed to the trial court; it being too late to raise the point for the first time on appeal.

4. Evidence ☞127(3)—Complaints of pain admissible.

In a personal injury action, testimony by the wife and mother of plaintiff as to statements made by him with reference to the pain and suffering which he was undergoing during the period in which he was recovering from his injuries held admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Archie G. Williams against the A. R. G. Bus Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it in the sum of $1,500, recovered by plaintiff as damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff was riding as a passenger in an automobile bus owned and operated by the defendant between Ontario and Riverside, Cal., when the automobile overturned.

[1, 2] The first point raised by the defendant is that the damages are excessive. The testimony shows that the plaintiff received a cut about an inch deep in the hip, which required a closure of the wound with stitches; that his back was wrenched and strained; that his leg and arm were bruised, and that his body was rendered stiff and sore, and his nervous system shocked by reason of his experience; that at the time of the trial he was still suffering from this nervous shock which made him constantly apprehensive in the performance of his work of driving an automobile. He spent nine days in a hospital, and was confined to his bed at his home for two weeks additional. He was unable to resume his work for six weeks, and his clothing, including an overcoat and suit, were ruined. He also incurred hospital and doctors' bills. Under such circumstances, we think the verdict of $1,500 is not so grossly excessive as to call for the interference of an appellate tribunal. It has been repeatedly held in this state that the power of an appellate court over excessive damages exists only when the facts are such that the excess appears as a matter of law, or is such as to suggest at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury. Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Hale v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 156 Cal. 716, 106 Pac. 83; Wheaton v. North Beach, etc., Co., 36 Cal. 591; Varcoe v. Lee, (Sup.) 181 Pac. 223.

In the case of Bond v. United Railroads, supra, it is said:

"The trial court should be vigilant to set aside verdicts where there is reason to believe this has been done, or that passion, prejudice, or sympathy has influenced the jury to give more than the facts reasonably warrant. We have cause to fear that the trial courts sometimes act on the theory that they can shift the responsibility in this matter to the appellate court, and that an excessive verdict can be corrected on appeal. This is a mistake. Our power over excessive damages exists only when the facts are such that the excess appears as a matter of law, or is such as to suggest at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury. [Citing cases.] Practically, the trial court must bear the whole responsibility in every case."

[3] Furthermore, it appears that the appellant made no motion for a new trial. If it considered the verdict the result of passion or prejudice, or a disregard of the instructions of the trial court, its remedy lay first in a motion for a new trial addressed to the trial court. It is said in the case of Chiarini v. Rochon, 1 Cal. Unrep. 540, that, if this matter is not brought before the attention of the trial court in a motion for new trial, it is too late to raise the point for the first time on appeal. It is stated in Bond v. United Railroads, supra:

"If a motion for a new trial on this ground is properly and regularly interposed, that court would have power to reduce or set aside the verdict. In the absence of such motion, it should have granted the plaintiff's motion to render judgment for $4,500, unless the amount was so obviously the result of passion, prejudice, or a disregard of the instructions as to justify the court in ordering a new trial of its own motion. As it did not do so, it is to be presumed that there was no cause for such action."

[4] Appellant also complains of the admission of testimony by the wife and mother of plaintiff as to statements made by him with reference to the pain and suffering which he was undergoing during the period in which he was recovering. This testimony was properly admitted under a well-recognized rule of evidence. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 162a et seq., p. 254; Green v. Pac. Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 435, 62 Pac. 747; Evarts v. Santa Barbara, etc., Ry. Co., 3 Cal. App. 712, 86 Pac. 830; Lange v. Schoettler, 115 Cal. 388, 393, 47 Pac. 139.

There are no other assignments of error which require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

PIONEER TRUCK CO. v. HAWLEY.
(Civ. 2784.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 20, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1920.)

Appeal and error ⇨ 931(7)—Assumed on appeal in replevin that defendant's possession was within issues, though not pleaded.

On appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover possession of personal property, it must be presumed, where no demurrer was filed in the case and court made findings as to defendant's possession, that the fact of defendant's possession at the commencement of the action was at the trial treated as a fact within the issues and properly determined by the court, although not properly pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by the Pioneer Truck Company against H. W. Hawley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. See, also, 179 Pac. 447.

Jensen & Jensen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Warren E. Libby, of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover judgment for possession of a certain described auto truck, or the value thereof if a return cannot be had, and for damages. Judgment having been entered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals therefrom, and the case is brought here upon the judgment roll alone.

Appellant claims that it nowhere appears, either from the complaint or the findings, that appellant ever had possession of the property sought to be recovered, and that for that reason the judgment should be reversed. He relies upon the rule that in an action of this kind the plaintiff cannot recover without alleging and proving that at the time of commencement of the action the property was in possession of the defendant. Riciotto v. Clement, 94 Cal. 105, 29 Pac. 414.

In the case at bar the only allegations touching the defendant are that, at a stated time a few days prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff demanded possession of said property from the defendant, and that defendant has failed, refused, and neglected to deliver the same to the plaintiff; "that plaintiff is damaged by the unlawful holding of said property in the sum of $25 for each and every day the same has been withheld since said 17th day of January," etc. The answer of the defendant was equally noncommittal and silent on the subject of defendant's possession of the truck, but denied the allegations above noted. The findings of fact affirm the demand by plaintiff, the failure and refusal of defendant to deliver the property to plaintiff, and declare that the plaintiff is damaged in a stated sum by the detention of said truck. In the "conclusions of law" it was further stated that the defendant "withholds possession thereof unlawfully from said plaintiff."

If the complaint does not wholly fail to touch upon the subject of possession of the property by defendant at the commencement of the action, it must at any rate be admitted that the implication of such possession is very defectively conveyed. Respondent contends, however, that since no demurrer was filed in the case, and since the court made findings as above stated, and it is not made to appear that any question was raised in the court below concerning the sufficiency of the complaint, this court must now assume, in favor of the findings and judgment, that the fact of defendant's possession of the truck at the commencement of the action was at the trial treated as a fact within the issues and properly to be determined by the court. On this ground we think that the judgment should be sustained. In Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 324, et seq., 147 Pac. 90, this subject is fully discussed. There it was conceded that the complaint failed to show a certain fact without which the action would not lie; nevertheless it appeared that the case had been tried and determined upon the theory that the issue was presented in the case. The court held that a defendant should not be permitted to stand by and, without objection, allow an issue to be tried as though properly presented by the pleadings, and on appeal escape the consequences by claiming that the complaint failed to present such issue. The difference between that case and this is that there the facts as to the conduct of the trial and the manner in which the evidence was received were before the Court of Appeal, whereas in the present case we have only the judgment roll. But in Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 110, 103 Pac. 332, the Supreme Court, upon a consideration of the pleadings and findings alone, determined that it appeared with reasonable certainty that the case was tried upon the theory that the answer put in issue the value of certain property, although technically that issue had not been properly presented by the pleadings. That being so, the court denied to the appellant the right to have the point considered that there was no such issue. The case of Illinois T. & S. Bank v. Pacific Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 297, 47 Pac. 60, was cited wherein "the presence in the record of a finding of the fact which it was claimed was not in issue was considered a sufficient showing that the cause was tried upon the theory that the fact was in issue."

The judgment is affirmed.

In re CRUICKSHANK. (Cr. 711.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1920.)

1. Attorney and client — Appellate court in disbarment proceedings concluded by finding on conflicting evidence.

In disbarment proceedings, regardless of the rule that guilt must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt, appellate court cannot disturb finding of trial court based on conflicting evidence that attorney should be disbarred for fraudulent use of money obtained to be used for specified purpose as an offense involving "moral turpitude," which is anything done contrary to justice or honesty and with the purpose of defrauding another regardless of whether such acts rise to dignity of a crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Moral Turpitude.]

2. Attorney and client — 53(2)—Code provision as to proof of false pretenses not applicable in disbarment proceedings.

Pen. Code, § 1110, specifying the character of proof required in order to convict one of false pretenses, is not applicable to disbarment proceeding against attorney who obtained money by fraudulent pretenses as to use to which it would be put.

3. Attorney and client — 46 — Attorney may be disbarred for defrauding his partner.

Conceding that partnership existed between attorney and another whom the attorney defrauded by acts constituting moral turpitude, such fact would be no defense to disbarment therefor.

4. Attorney and client — 55—Refusal of new trial not error where affidavits showed omissions to get evidence in.

An order disbarring an attorney cannot be reversed for refusal of new trial on affidavits showing merely that certain things were omitted to be done at trial in securing evidence to exonerate respondent conceding that counsel were inefficient.

5. Attorney and client — 57 — Reasons for disbarment no part of record on appeal.

In disbarment proceedings, reasons for disbarment stated by the judge are no part of judgment and have no place in the record on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Vernon Cruickshank, an attorney and counselor, was disbarred, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry G. Bodkin and Ford & Bodkin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles (Vernon M. Brydolf, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The trial of defendant, an attorney at law, upon an accusation filed by the Los Angeles Bar Association charging him with the commission of acts involving moral turpitude, resulted in a judgment of disbarment, from which, and an order overruling his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

The gist of the accusation is that appellant obtained from Henry Goetz the sum of $10,000 upon the representation that the same would not be used otherwise than in the construction and equipment of a certain plant and patented process for extracting ore from the black sands of certain lands located near Watsonville, Cal., wherein he and one J. R.

Ghiselin owned a controlling interest; that, instead of using the money for such purpose, he divided the same between himself and Ghiselin, both of whom appropriated the money to their own uses. That such was the theory adopted by the trial court conclusively appears from this statement made in the course of the trial, wherein the judge said:

"The only issue is what this money was going to be used for. All they claim is that they said the money was not used for what Mr. Cruickshank said it was going to be used. * * * That is all I am going to try. * * * The question is whether he (Cruickshank) represented that it would be used for a certain purpose and did not use it for that purpose. That is all there is, and that is all the complaint states."

While the evidence is to some extent conflicting, that of Goetz, which the court accepted as true, tends to show the following facts: That he and appellant had for many years been intimately acquainted and the latter had from time to time acted as his attorney in certain matters. In September, 1917, he, at the request of appellant, called at the latter's office, when appellant told him he had a proposition that was going to make lots of money; that he, with Ghiselin, was interested to the extent of 70 per cent. in a patented process to separate iron ore from black sand upon which they had an option, and needed $10,000 towards putting up the plant. Goetz said he did not want to gamble, but could let him have the money, provided his banker approved, to which Mr. Ghiselin, who was present, replied: "We are not going to give our secrets away." Whereupon Goetz said, "That lets me out," to which a Mrs. Thorkildsen, who was present, replied, "Well, all right, I will put up the money." Thereupon Goetz left the office, followed by appellant, who expressed his friendship for the former and the fact that there were tremendous profits in the proposition, and that, notwithstanding Mrs. Thorkildsen was going to put up $10,000, which he thought sufficient for the purpose, nevertheless they should have the additional money on hand for use as an emergency fund, since other money might be needed to complete the plant, and its equipment; and hence it was desired that they be prepared with money for such purpose, and that, if the money so advanced by Mrs. Thorkildsen was insufficient for the purpose, then and only in such case would his money be used therefor. Meanwhile he was assured the money was to be deposited and kept in bank. Goetz visited the property in company with appellant and Ghiselin, at which time he was cautioned by appellant and Ghiselin not to talk about the business in the presence of others, and by their acts and representations he was favorably impressed with the merits of the proposition. Upon returning to Los Angeles, Goetz was shown certain photographs of the proposed plant, tending to convince him that the plant could be erected for the money obtained from Mrs. Thorkildsen, and on September 21, 1917, when Goetz gave the check, appellant, in his office, said to him:

"Henry, we don't really need your money. I have money in the safe, $10,000, but I will not use that money (represented by the Goetz check) for any other purpose than what it is intended for."

Whereupon Ghiselin got up and pulled out the drawer in the safe and showed him the money. In delivering the check, Goetz said to appellant that he did not want Ghiselin to have anything to do with it, and stated:

"Now, Vernon, here is my check, hoping and trusting that everything you told me is nothing but the truth."

He had full confidence in the appellant and advanced the money to him, believing that it would be kept in the bank at Watsonville and only used in case the money obtained from Mrs. Thorkildsen was insufficient to erect the plant, in which case the money so advanced would be used towards such purpose; otherwise returned to him. Goetz obtained the money by borrowing it from his bank, appellant agreeing to reimburse him for such rate of interest as he was compelled to pay therefor, and voluntarily, it seems, proposed giving him a contract for a 5 per cent. interest in that of appellant and Ghiselin, similar to one which appellant said they were giving to Mrs. Thorkildsen. This receipt recited that Goetz had loaned them $10,000, in consideration of which they conveyed to him a 5 per cent. interest in the option therein described and in certain alleged patent rights in the machine to separate iron and steel from the black sands therein mentioned. No part of the money so advanced went into the construction of any plant or process, but upon receiving it appellant gave one-half thereof to Ghiselin, and the former used a part of his share in a trip to New York, made for the purpose, as claimed by him, of financing the black-sand proposition. There is much other evidence touching the question, but that referred to tends to show that appellant and Ghiselin engaged in a dishonest scheme to obtain the $10,000 from Goetz and did not intend to use it towards the completion of the proposed plant, but did at the time intend to appropriate it to their own use, and thus by deceiving Goetz he was fraudulently induced to advance the money, no part of which, other than $1,600, did he collect.

Appellant insists that a proceeding for disbarment is criminal in character, and therefore the proof, as in the trial of a criminal case, must show the defendant to be guilty as charged beyond a reasonable doubt, and insists that, notwithstanding the testimony of Goetz, it does not, when considered with testimony offered by defendant, establish a case justifying his disbarment, in support of which he cites a number of authorities from other jurisdictions.

[1] What was said by the Supreme Court, in answering a like contention (In re Morton, 179 Cal. 510, 177 Pac. 453), is appropriate here:

"Basing his contention upon the fact that a proceeding for the disbarment of an attorney is in the nature of a criminal proceeding (In re Alameda County Bar Ass'n, 35 Cal. App. 534, 170 Pac. 432), counsel insists that, to warrant disbarment, the evidence, like that required to justify a verdict of guilty in a criminal case, must be clear, positive, and such as to establish both the motive and commission of the act charged beyond a reasonable doubt. In support of this proposition he cites a number of authorities from other jurisdictions, an examination of which, however, shows that none of them involved cases on appeal where the court was called upon to review the sufficiency of the evidence in support of the finding, but what was said therein related to proceedings of disbarment over which the court, in some of the cases having recourse to a referee in the taking of the evidence, assumed original jurisdiction, acting as a trial court, as in re Houghton, 67 Cal. 511, 8 Pac. 52. None of them constituted authority for appellant's claim, when applied to a court charged with the duty of reviewing the testimony, but do announce the rule that in such cases the accused should not be convicted unless the trial court is convinced, by clear and satisfactory evidence, or, as said in some cases, beyond a reasonable doubt, of his guilt. However this may be, this court, in a like case involving a like question (Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 Pac. 322), has, in effect, held that in disbarment proceedings, as in other cases, a court of review cannot determine the weight to be given conflicting evidence, but that such determination is the peculiar and exclusive province of the tribunal wherein the hearing is had."

Hence, since the trial court in the exercise of its function believed the testimony of Goetz, and, though conceding its denial on the part of defendant, we cannot say the evidence was insufficient to justify the implied finding of the court that defendant was guilty of acts constituting moral turpitude, which is anything done contrary to justice or honesty and with the purpose of defrauding another, regardless of whether such acts rise to the dignity of a crime. In re Disbarment of Coffey, 123 Cal. 522, 56 Pac. 448; In re Kirby, 10 S. D. 322, 73 N. W. 92, 39 L. R. A. 856. On the contrary we hold appellant's contention in this regard to be without merit.

[2] Neither is there any merit in the contention that section 1110 of the Penal Code, which specifies the character of proof required in order to convict one of false pretenses, is applicable to a case of this character.

[3] Another argument made by appellant is that there existed between appellant, Goetz, and Ghiselin the relationship of copartners. This is based upon the fact that appellant and Ghiselin conveyed to Goetz 5 per cent. interest in their option. We are unable to perceive any merit in the contention. But conceding the existence of the copartnership, such fact would not constitute any defense to a proceeding brought against an attorney for acts constituting moral turpitude in defrauding his partner.

[4] In support of a motion for a new trial made by defendant, he filed an affidavit wherein it is alleged that the court abused its discretion in (a) denying a few minutes continuance of the case to allow appellant to secure the evidence of the president of the Bar Association as to the alleged fact that Goetz had exonerated appellant from any misconduct; (b) that an affidavit by complainant exonerating appellant was in the possession of the secretary of the Bar Association; (c) that after the alleged misconduct of appellant he acted as attorney for Goetz; (d) that prior to the disbarment proceeding Goetz sued appellant and Ghiselin and in his complaint and testimony offered at the trial made statements inconsistent with his testimony given in this proceeding; (e) that the disbarment citation was returnable October 9, 1918, and the case was tried October 15, 1918, over the objection of appellant, during which time appellant's counsel was sick and appellant unskilled in the trial of a lawsuit and therefore unable to present a proper defense. As to all of these, and other like contentions, a sufficient answer thereto is that the record discloses no such applications made during the trial of the case, and no facts are stated in the affidavit showing the discovery of any new evidence which was not known and accessible to defendant at the time of the trial. There is nothing in the record showing that defendant, when the case was set down for trial, made any objection thereto upon the ground that the time was too short for him to prepare his defense, or that he asked for continuance in order to produce the evidence of the president of the Bar Association. On the contrary, the effect of the affidavit is to merely show that defendant omitted the doing of things which he thereafter felt that he should have done in protecting his interest at the trial. It may be, as suggested by appellant, that such omissions were due to the inefficiency of counsel then appearing for him; but the court cannot, in the absence of a duly authenticated record showing error, reverse an order upon such ground.

At the close of the trial the court, in rendering its judgment, said:

"I realize the seriousness of disbarring an attorney, but the accused is not doing a very substantial amount of law practice, according to his own statements, and there would not be much damage done by disbarring him."

[5] It has been repeatedly held that the reasons stated by a judge in deciding a case are no part of the judgment and have no place in the record, and hence present nothing to be considered in reviewing a judgment on appeal therefrom. However, we may say that in arriving at its decision we cannot believe the trial court was in the slightest degree influenced by the limited extent of defendant's law practice.

The judgment is affirmed.

VAUGHN v. FEY. (Civ. 3350.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 11, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 12, 1920.)

1. Cancellation of instruments ☞1—Suit for "rescission" held synonymous with suit for "annulment."

A suit to "rescind" a contract cannot be differentiated from a suit to "annul" the contract; the two words being used interchangeably.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Annul; Rescission.]

2. Contracts ☞260—Entire contract may be rescinded for partial failure of consideration.

Where a contract is entire, there is a right of rescission thereof for a partial failure of consideration under Civ. Code, § 1689, providing that plaintiff offers to restore to defendants everything of value received under the contract in view of section 1691.

3. Contracts ☞266(1)—Plaintiff held entitled to rescission only upon return of value received.

Where plaintiff has entered into a contract with defendant whereby defendant was to advance money to pay for time and materials for the building of a model of an invention for automatically changing phonograph needles and for a patent thereon, plaintiff held not entitled to rescind on the ground of partial breach without returning or offering to return everything of value received by him.

4. Contracts ☞266(1) — Personal receipt of consideration not essential to duty to return on rescission.

In a suit to rescind a contract for the construction of a model and procurement of patent on a device for changing phonograph needles because of partial breach thereof by defendant, that part of the money paid by defendant had not been paid directly to plaintiff, but to the Patent Office and to vendors of materials, did not excuse plaintiff from his obligation to return consideration paid for his benefit.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Suit by J. L. Vaughn against Charles Fey to annul a contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Maurice R. Carey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment annulling a contract which had been entered into between the parties hereto. J. L. Vaughn, being the inventor of certain improvements on an automatic phonograph, embodying in particular a new invention for automatically changing the steel needle used for producing the sound from the records, desired to perfect and patent this device, and for this purpose entered into a contract, on June 22, 1916, with Charles Fey, by which contract Fey agreed to advance money to pay for all of the materials required for the building of a model and to furnish shoproom for the building of the same, and to pay to Vaughn $20 each week for a period of 90 days from the date of the agreement, to cover the time Vaughn would be engaged in working upon the model, and also to advance a sufficient sum to cover the cost of securing a patent in the United States upon the said invention, to be applied for when the working model was completed and perfected. In consideration of this agreement by Fey, Vaughn agreed to transfer to Fey a one-half interest in any patent which he might obtain in the United States upon his said invention.

This agreement is set out in full in the complaint herein, and it is alleged that the defendant failed and refused to advance the money necessary for the patent. There is no allegation of an offer to restore what the plaintiff received from the defendant under the contract, and the prayer of the complaint is that the contract between the parties be annulled.

The defendant's demurrer was overruled, and he answered, denying a breach of said contract on his part, and pleading full performance thereof. He also set up as an affirmative defense that the plaintiff had not returned nor offered to return the consideration received from the defendant under the contract. This latter allegation was admitted by the plaintiff upon the trial, and no evidence was offered by him to excuse his failure to place the defendant in statu quo. It was further admitted by the plaintiff at the trial that the defendant had supplied the workroom, tools, and equipment for the building of the model, and had expended the sum of $95 for materials, equipment, etc.,

used in the construction of the same; that he had paid to the plaintiff $100 in weekly payments of $20 each during the period plaintiff was engaged upon the work; that he had advanced the sum of $230 for the purpose of paying the expense of securing a patent upon the said invention; that thereafter the Patent Office refused to issue one patent covering all the elements of the invention, but insisted upon a "divisional" patent; and that plaintiff, without consultation with defendant, then directed that the money advanced by the defendant be applied to obtaining a patent upon the main device, which patent was duly issued. Plaintiff then asked the defendant for an additional $85 to cover the cost of a separate patent upon the device for changing the steel needle. Defendant refused to advance this last-mentioned sum, and the controversy arises over this refusal; it being admitted by the plaintiff that in all other particulars the defendant fully kept and performed all of his obligations under the contract.

The defendant and appellant in support of his allegation of full performance urges that the contract calls for only one patent, and that in advancing the money to secure one patent defendant fulfilled his part of the contract. However that may be, the admitted facts show that the defendant has expended the sum of $425, in addition to furnishing shoproom, tools, and equipment for the completion of the model, and the testimony of the defendant is that he expended a larger amount.

Upon these facts, the court decreed an annulment or rescission of the contract, and made no provision in the decree for a return to the defendant of the money which he had parted with under the contract.

[1] The respondent's position is not well taken in seeking to differentiate a suit for the annulment of this contract from a suit for a rescission of a contract. The two words are used interchangeably. Haines v. Stilwell, 5 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 27, 40 Pac. 332; Words and Phases, vol. 7, p. 6139; Bouvier's Law Dictionary; 1 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, p. 1; Webster's New International Dictionary.

[2] We have, then, a suit in equity for the rescission of a contract. Without going into the question of whether or not the plaintiff is entitled under the contract to demand from the defendant money to defray the expenses of obtaining a second patent, and, conceding for the purpose of a decision of this case, that he was so entitled, and that the defendant failed in that particular to fulfill his contract, it is obvious that defendant's breach constituted only a partial failure of consideration. Where a contract is entire, there is a right of rescission thereof for a partial failure of consideration under section 1689, Civil Code. Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 117, 85 Pac. 305. But it is also stated in said last-mentioned case that the pleadings contained an allegation that everything of value received under the contract had been restored by the party rescinding to the other party. Sterling v. Gregory, supra, 149 Cal. at page 118, 85 Pac. 305. It is said in the case of Fountain v. Semi-Tropic L. & W. Co., 99 Cal. 677, 683,¹ that in case of rescission each party to the contract must restore to the other everything of value received and pay for labor performed for him under the contract, no matter at whose instance the rescission is made. The decision cites, upon this point, numerous California cases.

In the case of Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 532, at pages 535 and 536, it is said:

"When a vendee has so failed to perform the contract that the vendor may elect to treat the contract as rescinded, it is incumbent on the vendor, in order to work that result, to restore to the vendee whatever he has paid on the contract. * * * The plaintiff has failed to allege a repayment or tender of the amount paid by the defendant, at the execution of the contract. He therefore cannot proceed to recover the possession of the premises on the ground of the rescission of the contract."

The language of these various decisions but declares the law as announced in section 1691, Civil Code, which expressly provides that rescission, when not accomplished by consent, can be accomplished only by the use on the part of the party rescinding of reasonable diligence to comply with the following rules:

"* * * 2. He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract; or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so."

See, also, Hammond v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 522, 531, 532, 24 Pac. 837, 20 Am. St. Rep. 239; Buena Vista Fruit & V. Co. v. Tuohy, 107 Cal. 243, 255, 40 Pac. 386; Hite v. Merc. Trust Co., 156 Cal. 765, 767, 106 Pac. 102; Walsh v. Standart, 174 Cal. 807, 811, 164 Pac. 795; Maginess v. West. Securities Corp., 38 Cal. App. 56, 175 Pac. 277.

[3] It seems plain, therefore, conceding that the defendant has partially breached his contract, and that this breach entitles the plaintiff to rescind the same, that nevertheless plaintiff may only do so upon returning to the defendant everything of value received by plaintiff from the defendant.

[4] It is idle to urge that, because a part of the money was not paid directly to the plaintiff, but to the Patent Office for the patent, and to the vendors of materials for supplies to be used in completing the model, the plaintiff, therefore, has received nothing which he is obligated to return. The money was paid under the contract for the benefit of the plaintiff and to enable him to perfect his invention, and he accepted the benefits thereof in the way of materials to complete his model and letters patent upon his invention. The situation is not different in principle from what it would have been had the money been paid to plaintiff personally. The judgment is reversed.

CONREY P. J. Action brought by plaintiff to recover possession of personal property. Judgment for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom. The judgment roll is the only record before us.

The judgment, in terms, is that the defendant recover from plaintiff the said personal property, or, if delivery thereof cannot be had, then the defendant have judgment in a stated sum (found to be the value of the property, less a certain allowed credit), and for costs.

The answer filed by defendant did not claim a return of the property. Indeed, there is nothing in the pleadings or findings to indicate that the property was delivered to the plaintiff, or was not all the time held in possession of the defendant. Under such circumstances, that part of the judgment which grants to the defendant affirmative relief cannot be sustained, except as a judgment for costs. Code Civ. Proc. $\S\S$ 627 and 667; Banning v. Marleau, 101 Cal. 238, 35 Pac. 772.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom that part thereof which provides that defendant recover the described automobile, or, in case delivery thereof cannot be had, that defendant have and recover the sum of $405.90.

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

2. Trial $\S$ 397(1)—Specific findings not necessary as to affirmative evidentiary matters alleged in answer.

In architect's action for service, where defendant's answer did not set up a conditional contract, or make the defense that plaintiff architect had not complied with the conditions required of him, the affirmative matters alleged were merely of an evidentiary nature in connection with defendant's denial that he contracted with plaintiff architect, and as to such matters specific findings were not necessary.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Philip Cohen, of Los Angeles (Walter F. McEntire, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover fees alleged to be due to him from the defendant on a contract for professional services which were rendered by the plaintiff as an architect. It was found by the court that the defendant employed the plaintiff as such architect to prepare plans and specifications for the erection of a hotel building at a described location in the city of Los Angeles, and agreed to pay therefor the sum of $900, which sum was to cover the cost of superintending the erection and construction of the building; also, that the plaintiff prepared plans and specifications, as required by the defendant, and has at all times been ready, willing, and able to perform the services of superintending the erection and construction of the said building, but the defendant has refused and still refuses to erect and construct said hotel building in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by the plaintiff, and has refused to pay, etc. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

Appellant contends that the findings above mentioned are not sustained by the evidence. In support of his contention that the evidence is not sufficient to establish the contract of employment on the terms stated in the complaint and found by the court, appellant insists that the evidence without conflict shows that the contract of employment was conditioned upon plaintiff procuring a tenant for the contemplated building, acceptable to the defendant. While an examination of the record shows that there was testimony given by the defendant and others tending to prove that the contract of employment was conditional, as above stated, yet such evidence was not without conflict. On the contrary, there is evidence strongly tending to show that the contract was free from such condition. This evidence showed, among other things, that the plaintiff was introduced to the defendant by one Seigel, a contractor, and that the plaintiff told the defendant that, if defendant was willing to take a little less rent than he was proposing to demand, plaintiff was sure he could get him a tenant; that very promptly thereafter the plaintiff, through an agent, obtained the name of a prospective tenant and informed defendant that he had a tenant for the hotel; that this tenant, one Mrs. Verhaar, is the same person who afterwards became the tenant of defendant's building after it had been constructed by the defendant on plans prepared by an architect other than the plaintiff; that, shortly after plaintiff's first conversation with defendant, an interview took place between plaintiff and defendant and Mrs. Verhaar, at which time Mrs. Verhaar stated that she would take the house if the plans suited her, but would not sign the agreement until the plans were completed; that the plaintiff prepared the plans and completed them about four weeks after the time of said interview at which Mrs. Verhaar was present; that during these four weeks the defendant and the contractor were present at the plaintiff's office many times, examining the plans and making suggestions concerning the same; that before the plans were prepared the defendant directed the plaintiff to go ahead with their preparation and promised to pay fees amounting to 3 per cent. of the cost of the proposed building, such cost being estimated at $30,000. The testimony of the witnesses indicates that in their preliminary negotiations the defendant was influenced by the prospect that the plaintiff might aid him in procuring a tenant for the proposed building and that such probable tenant had been found. But this testimony was not compelling upon the court to find that the procuring of such tenant entered into and became a part of the actual employment of the architect to prepare the plans and specifications. After those plans and specifications had been completed, the defendant refused to proceed according to those plans and specifications, or to avail himself further of the services of the plaintiff. No reason or excuse for such refusal appears in the record; although it does appear that the defendant, with the assistance of other architects, erected a hotel building at the proposed location and that Mrs. Verhaar became the tenant thereof.

[1] Being satisfied with the court's finding of an unconditional contract, we need not discuss the second point of appellant, which is that, assuming that plaintiff was bound to procure a tenant, he did not comply with that condition.

[2] Finally, appellant contends that the court "failed to find on the material issue raised by the answer that the contract was a conditional one," and that the judgment should be reversed, for that reason. The affirmative matters stated in the answer and to which this argument is directed are, in fact, not sufficient to present the defense that there was a conditional contract. On the contrary, those matters were pleaded only as a part of the defense that there was no contract of employment whatever. The affirmative matters in question stated that the plaintiff made a proposition to the defendant concerning a lease to be made to a prospective tenant to be produced by the plaintiff and proposed that plaintiff act as architect in making the plans and superintending the construction of such building; and then alleges that no agreement was made with the plaintiff by the defendant for the drafting of plans or specifications of said building, or the supervision of the construction of the same, and that such plans as the plaintiff did prepare were prepared wholly and solely at his own instance, and not on request of defendant or pursuant to any employment by the defendant. It thus appears that the answer did not set up a conditional contract or make the defense that the plaintiff had not complied with the conditions required of him thereby. This being so, the affirmative matters stated were merely of an evidentiary nature in connection with defendant's denial that he made any contract with the plaintiff. As to matters so pleaded in the answer, specific findings were not necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

HART, J. The clerk's and reporter's transcripts in this case were filed in this court on December 27, 1919. The case was regularly placed on the April, 1920, calendar, and, when called, counsel for appellants requested and were granted 30 days' time in which to file an opening brief. Such time having expired without the filing of a brief, and no extension of time having been requested or granted, the case is now ordered submitted upon the record.

By an information filed in the superior court by the district attorney of Sacramento county, defendants were charged with having, in September, 1919, entered the store of O. Morelli, in the city of Sacramento, with intent to commit the crime of larceny. Defendants were jointly tried, the jury found them guilty, and they were sentenced by the court to imprisonment in the state prison.

We have carefully examined the record, and are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to justify the verdict of guilty. The law was correctly stated to the jury by the court, and we discover in the record no error prejudicial to the defendants.

The judgment is affirmed.

SEABOARD NAT. BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. BELDEN et al. (Civ. 3342.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1920.)

1. Bills and notes §140 — Though renewal notes were given, action may be on original obligation.

Though a corporation gave renewal notes in place of the original, yet, where there was nothing to indicate that the original obligation was extinguished, action might be brought thereon instead of the renewal notes.

2. Bills and notes §296—Indorser for value after maturity cannot set up defenses.

Where a corporation after maturity indorsed notes to plaintiff for value, defenses available to the maker were not available to the corporation, the indorser's warranty (Civ. Code, § 3116), not permitting, and so such defenses were not available in an action to recover on stockholder's liability.

3. Corporations §215—Stockholder's liability is primary and unaffected by guaranty of the debt.

The liability of stockholders of a corporation is primary, and a stockholder cannot escape because a corporate creditor held a guaranty of the corporation's obligations.

Action by the Seaboard National Bank of San Francisco against Leo V. Belden and others. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant Fred G. Jones appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Rinehart, of Oakland, for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant Jones from a judgment in an action brought to recover on a stockholder's liability, as a stockholder of the Luther Burbank Company, a corporation. The indebtedness upon which this judgment against appellant was rendered was evidenced by eight promissory notes, as follows: Five notes executed by the corporation to the plaintiff directly, and three notes executed to the corporation by Joseph H. Clark and subsequently indorsed over to and sold to the plaintiff by the corporation.

Appellant contends: First, that the five corporation notes were paid and extinguished by new notes given in their place; second, that the Clark notes were by the corporation indorsed to the plaintiff after maturity, and were taken by plaintiff subject to defenses; and, third, that plaintiff had received a guaranty of all the liabilities of the corporation, and for that reason cannot enforce the liability of the appellant.

[1] The evidence upon the first point is to the effect that new notes were given in the place of the five original notes. The action was upon the original liability evidenced by these notes. The new notes were renewal notes. There is nothing in the evidence to support the contention that the original obligation, as evidenced by these five notes, was extinguished by the giving and accepting of new notes. The action was properly brought upon the original obligation, even though the original notes had been surrendered (Bonestell v. Bowie, 128 Cal. 511, 61 Pac. 78; Clark v. Berlin Realty Co., 33 Cal. App. 50, 164 Pac. 333), and there being no express agreement that the renewal notes should constitute payment, and such notes not having been in fact paid (Comptoir d'Escompte v. Dresbach, 78 Cal. 15, 20 Pac. 28).

[2] It is not apparent how appellant's rights are in any way affected by the Clark notes being indorsed by the corporation to the plaintiff after maturity. Such defenses as might exist would be in favor of the original maker, Clark. If the corporation had any defenses, appellant neither pleaded nor offered to prove them and has not even suggested what they are to this time. But if there were any defenses they would not be available to the corporation as indorser for value. The indorser's warranty would not permit it. Civ. Code, § 3116.

[3] Neither is there any merit in appellant's third point that the guaranty of the liability of the corporation is in any sense a defense available to appellant sued on stockholder's liability. The liability of the stockholders of a corporation is direct and primary, arising coincidentally with the debt of the corporation, and is not changed nor affected by the existence of a guaranty. London & S. F. Bank v. Parrott, 125 Cal. 472, 58 Pac. 164, 73 Am. St. Rep. 64; Eva v. Andersen, 166 Cal. 420, 137 Pac. 16.

The objection that the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense was not waived by failure to demur and was properly raised by a motion in arrest of judgment, under Pen. Code, §§ 1004, 1012, 1185.

2. False pretenses ⚡26—Information held defective.

In charging the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, the false pretenses must be shown to be a material element in inducing the prosecuting witness to part with his money or property.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment of conviction of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, and also from an order denying defendant's motion in arrest of judgment. There are a number of grounds of appeal enumerated in the notice of appeal, but the appellant urges upon our attention but one of these matters, and, as this objection, in our opinion, is decisive of the case, it will be unnecessary to discuss any of the others.

The objection is that the information fails in two respects to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense: First, because no causal connection is shown or can be inferred between the representations alleged to be false and the parting with the money; and, second, because the information fails to allege facts showing that the complaining witness, Lansdale, was defrauded.

[1] The objection to the information is a matter of substance, and not of form, and was not waived by a failure to demur, and was properly raised by the motion in arrest of judgment. Pen. Code, §§ 1004, 1012, 1185; People v. Ross, 103 Cal. 425, 428, 37 Pac. 379; People v. Smith, 103 Cal. 563, 566, 37 Pac. 516; People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488.

The information alleges that the defendant made certain representations to W. R. Lansdale with fraudulent intent. The representations are then set out. In the brief filed on behalf of the state these allegations are summarized as follows:

"(1) That defendant was the owner of a valuable mine in the state of Nevada known as the Lucky Girl group of mines.

"(2) That said mines were of the value of $100,000.

"(3) That defendant had on deposit in the Central National Bank of Oakland $4,700.

"(4) That defendant had on deposit in said bank $25,000 to her credit as executrix and sole legatee of the McIntyre estate.

"(5) That defendant was worth over $1,000,000 and was the owner of property in New York of the value of over $1,000,000.

"(6) That defendant was the owner of ten sections of wheat land near Alberta, Canada, worth over $1,000,000.

"(7) That defendant owned two large hotels, seventeen granaries, and a traction engine all situate near Alberta, Canada.

"(8) That defendant had left Canada because that country had gone dry and she was compelled to close the bars of the hotels.

"(9) That defendant received an income of $6,500 payable every 40 days.

"(10) That she had given instructions to the Canadian Bank of Commerce to transfer all money on deposit with said bank, amounting to the sum of $6,500 to the Elko National Bank, Nev., and that said sum would be on deposit to her credit January 1, 1918.

"(11) That she had discharged her attorney, and that he had attached and garnished her money in the sum of $4,700 on deposit in the Central National Bank of Oakland, and that she was thereby prevented from withdrawing any part thereof."

It is then alleged that these representations, with the exception of the first and second, are false and untrue. Then follows an allegation that the defendant knew the representations were untrue, and that Lansdale, believing said representations, and being deceived thereby, was induced by reason thereof to enter into a certain agreement. The terms of the agreement are then specified, and they are that the defendant would hire and employ said Lansdale and his wife and son at specified salaries at the Lucky Girl group of mines, and that the defendant would sell and convey to said Lansdale an undivided one-third interest in said group of mines. In consideration of which agreement, said Lansdale paid the defendant $300. It is alleged that Lansdale, "in pursuance of said promises, representations, and agreements so made by said Florence W. Bliss, and being deceived thereby, did then and there pay over and deliver to the said Florence W. Bliss the sum of $300." There is no direct allegation, nor any allegations from which it might be inferred, that the defendant did not own the Lucky Girl group of mines; that they were not worth $100,000; that Lansdale and his wife and son were not employed by the defendant; and that they did not get a one-third interest in the said mine.

[2, 3] It seems clear, therefore, that there is no causal connection shown between the allegations alleged to be false and the parting with the $300 by Lansdale. It is a well-settled rule that, in charging the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, the false pretenses must be a material element in inducing the prosecuting witness to part with his money or property. People v. Kahler, 26 Cal. App. 452, 147 Pac. 228; People v. Haas, 28 Cal. App. 182, 151 Pac. 672; People v. Canfield, 28 Cal. App. 792, 154 Pac. 33.

It is contended by the respondent that this case fairly falls within the rule of the case of People v. Griesheimer, 176 Cal. 44, 167 Pac. 521. In that case it is said:

"While there is no direct allegation that the money was paid to the defendant as a subscription or loan to the 'Fatherland Magazine,' a reader of the information could hardly draw from it any other inference than that the payment was made for such purpose. It may be conceded that a direct allegation to this effect would have been more in accord with technical requirements. But what was intended to be charged in this connection is perfectly plain from the language in fact used, and no person of common understanding could fail to understand that it was substantially charged, by necessary inference at least, that the money was paid because of the alleged false representations, and for the purpose suggested thereby."

In the present case it not only does not appear by necessary or even possible inference that the money was paid because of the representations which are alleged to have been false, but it is expressly charged in the information that the money was paid for a specific purpose; i. e., in consideration of a promise to give to Lansdale a one-third interest in a valuable gold mine owned by defendant, and in further consideration of the promise by the defendant to employ Lansdale and his family at that mine. It is apparent that, if one is purchasing an interest in a mine and securing employment therein, an inducing representation would be as to the ownership and value of the mine. It is clear that the representations concerning these facts were the inducing cause for the parting with the money, and these representations are not alleged to have been false. The only representations alleged to have been false are representations totally disconnected with the purpose for which Lansdale parted with his money. A similar question is presented in the case of People v. Kahler, supra; indeed, that case seems to present a legal situation closely analogous to the one here. That case is discussed and approved in the case of People v. Canfield, supra.

In the Kahler Case it is said:

"While not alleged, it is no doubt true that Cogan was induced to buy the drums and traps in reliance upon defendant's promise to give his son musical instruction and to secure him employment as soon as he was sufficiently proficient. It was this promise which induced the prosecutor to deal with him, and not the representation of existing facts in reliance upon the truth of which Cogan believed that defendant would fulfill his promise."

So in the present case it was the promise to convey a one-third interest in the mine and to employ the prosecutor and his family which caused him to enter into the agreement with the defendant and to part with his money, and not the representations of existing facts as to defendant's wealth, which latter may have given the prosecutor additional reason to believe that the defendant would fulfill her agreement, but were not the consideration upon which he parted with his property.

Furthermore, the information fails to allege facts showing that Lansdale was defrauded. There is no allegation that Lansdale did not receive from the defendant just what it is alleged she agreed to give him—a one-third interest in this mine and employment for himself and family. There can be no presumption that Lansdale did not receive these things, in the absence of an allegation to that effect, and, if he received what defendant had agreed to give him, there would be no offense on the part of the defendant. People v. Tufts, 167 Cal. 266, 270, 139 Pac. 78. It is clearly apparent that, if defendant did own the mine, which was of the value claimed, and did give to Lansdale a one-third interest therein, and employment for himself and family, it would be immaterial in a criminal inquiry whether or not she falsely represented that she owned in addition thereto a million dollars worth of real property in Canada and a million dollars worth of real property in New York, or all the wealth of the Aztecs, as Lansdale was not led to believe that he would be entitled to any interest in any property except the mine.

The motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted, as the information was insufficient to charge a public offense.

The judgment is reversed.

PIDGEON v. SAN DIEGO CONSOL. BREWING CO. (Civ. 3311.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 22, 1920.)

1. Corporations — 264 — Stockholder's liability on obligation created by law barred in three years; "time when liability was created."

A stockholder's liability to his corporation is an obligation created by law, barred at the expiration of three years from the time when the liability was created, the words referring to the time "when the liability was created," as set forth in Code Civ. Proc. § 359, applying to the time when the corporation made the contract out of which the liability arises, and not to the time of any breach by the corporation.

2. Corporations — 264 — Corporation's contract of sale created contingent liability when made and before order placed thereunder.

Under contract for sale of beer by corporation in which defendant held stock, made with plaintiff suing to enforce defendant stockholder's liability, liability of the corporation, within Code Civ. Proc. § 359, barring obligations created by law, was created when the contract was made, and before plaintiff placed an order for beer.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by P. F. Pidgeon against the San Diego Consolidated Brewing Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. J. Mossholder, of San Diego, for appellant.

Eugene Daney and Lane D. Webber, both of San Diego, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant in an action to recover from the defendant, on its statutory liability as a stockholder of the Mission Brewing Company, a corporation, a fixed proportion of an alleged indebtedness of the Mission Brewing Company to the plaintiff. The judgment was entered pursuant to an order sustaining the defendant's demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend the complaint. One of the grounds of demurrer was that the action is barred by the provisions of section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The complaint was filed on the 17th day of September, 1918. The complaint sets forth the terms of a contract entered into on the 11th day of August, 1913, between plaintiff and the Mission Brewing Company under which, at a stated price per barrel, the company agreed to sell and deliver beer to the plaintiff as ordered. The complaint alleged, in effect, that said contract was in force at all times from the making thereof to and including the 6th day of July, 1918, at which time the Mission Brewing Company refused to further perform the contract and notified the plaintiff that it would not thereafter deliver beer to him, except at a stated price per barrel, which was very much higher than the price fixed by the contract. Further allegations show loss and damage to the plaintiff by the refusal of the Mission Brewing Company to comply with the terms of said agreement.

[1] The question presented by this appeal has been fully discussed and should be regarded as having been permanently settled by recent decisions of the Supreme Court.

The rule is thereby established that in cases of this kind a stockholder's liability is an obligation created by law, which is barred at the expiration of three years from the time when the liability was created; that the words referring to the time "when the liability was created," as set forth in section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure, apply to the time when the corporation made the contract out of which the liability arises, and not to the time of any breach of the contract by the corporation. For a full statement of the law on this subject it is only necessary to refer to such late cases as Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 500, 153 Pac. 939 and Chambers v. Farnham (Sup.) 187 Pac. 732.

[2] We think there is no merit in appellant's contention that under the contract set out in the complaint no liability was created (within the meaning of the code section above cited) against the Mission Brewing Company "until Pidgeon placed an order for beer. Each time he placed an order for beer a new liability arose." It is now too clear for further argument that, if the Mission Brewing Company was ever liable to the plaintiff by reason of the transactions mentioned in the complaint, that liability must have arisen out of the contract of August 11, 1913. This being so, the statute limiting the time for the commencement of an action against a stockholder for a breach of that contract began to run in favor of the stockholder at the date of the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; Geo. H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Florence Agnes Smyth against Oscar Fitch, as administrator of the estate of Emily Charles, deceased, in which Major S. Williams and another intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and interveners appeal. Affirmed.

William F. Bray, of Placerville, for appellants.

J. F. Pullen, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was in the usual form to quiet title to certain real property in the county of El Dorado. The appellants herein became parties by a complaint in intervention, in which they alleged failure of consideration, fraud, and undue influence on the part of plaintiff in obtaining the deed which she claims; and, upon the issues thus raised, a trial was had, and the findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff. The appeal was taken under the alternative method, but appellants have not presented in their brief any of the evidence upon which they relied or to which they desired to direct the attention of this court, as required by section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. Nevertheless, we have examined the record, and are satisfied that, contrary to the contention of appellants, the findings are amply supported, and that we would not be justified in disturbing the conclusion of the lower court. We may state the salient facts as follows: Emily Charles, a widow, and mother of eight children, among whom were the plaintiff and the interveners herein, was for many years prior to her death in 1916 the owner of a 160-acre farm in said county. On February 24, 1908, she was declared to be mentally incompetent by the superior court of that county, and Manfred J. Williams, a son and one of the appellants herein, was appointed guardian, but never qualified or acted as such. On March 27, 1911, she was restored to competency by said court, Judge Arnot presiding, and a judgment of restoration duly made and entered, from which no appeal has ever been taken. After her restoration and upon the same day she made, executed, and delivered to one of her daughters, Florence Agnes Smyth, respondent herein, a deed of said tract of land, wherein she "granted, bargained and sold, conveyed and confirmed" the same to said daughter in consideration of the sum of $10, and also in further consideration of the performance by the grantee of certain conditions, including the constant personal presence of the grantee upon said farm, and also the furnishing by her to the grantor of food, clothing, medical attendance, nurse's care, and the defraying of the expense of the last illness, final interment of the grantor after death, said deed providing for reversion in case of a breach. Appellants contend in their brief that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that the grantor was competent to make such deed, and also that the grantee complied with and carried out the conditions therein prescribed.

[1, 2] As to the first of these contentions, the order restoring the grantor to competency, which was admitted in evidence without objection, would be sufficient to support the finding as to her said capacity. Moreover, this was supplemented by the testimony of various witnesses, who expressed their opinion that the old lady was capable of transacting business and of understanding the nature of the transaction resulting in the execution of said deed. From the evidence which was thus presented we deem it sufficient to quote from the deposition of C. E. Peters, an attorney at law, as follows:

"I saw her on that date [March 11, 1911], in the courtroom of the superior court, El Dorado county, and also at my office. Judge Arnot presided in the superior court. Mrs. Florence Smyth, daughter of Mrs. Charles, Major Williams, son of Mrs. Charles, and possibly Harry Williams and Manfred Williams were present at the session of the superior court, and I was there at that time. After proper proceedings the court made an order restoring Mrs. Charles to mental competency. That was followed by a judgment which was duly entered in the records of the court. After the court proceedings Mrs. Florence Smyth and Mrs. Charles went to my office, and a deed was drawn, conveying certain property to Mrs. Smyth, and, as I remember it, reserving a life interest to Mrs. Charles. I have not seen the deed since it was executed. The deed was acknowledged by Mrs. Charles before Hon. Chas. A. Swisler, notary public. I was also satisfied that Mrs. Charles was fully competent, mentally, to execute the instrument. She was quite old at that time, about 80 years, I believe, and she showed keen alertness and understanding. She was especially practical for a woman of her years; her only hindrance being that she was somewhat deaf. The deed was made by Mrs. Charles without any influence or duress against her of any kind. She did it willingly and voluntarily, stating that she believed it to be the best thing for her to do, considering her circumstances, health, and years."

As to the other point, plaintiff herself testified as follows:

"Q. You promised and agreed and bound yourself to certain conditions expressed in this deed? A. Yes. Q. Among others to support and maintain the party of the first part as long as she lived, and that you should furnish at your expense food, clothing, medical attendance, nurse's care, and the expenses of the last illness—funeral expenses and various other conditions expressed in the deed; you agreed to do that, did you? A. Yes. Q. You did all of that? A. I did. Q. To the best of your ability you complied with all of the conditions of the deed?

A. I did. Q. Giving your mother kind attention and care? A. Yes. Q. You have paid for the funeral expenses and erected a monument upon her grave? A. I did. Q. Paid the various expenses of the ranch and taking care of your mother? A. I did."

[3] The foregoing evidence would be sufficient, of course, to support the finding of the court as to the said conditions, but we may add that she was corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses.

We think the appeal is without substantial merit, and the judgment is affirmed.

LEAVER v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 3307.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1920.)

1. Execution $\Leftrightarrow$ 283—After year purchaser may quiet title, although no deed has been issued.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 700, 702, providing that the purchaser at execution sale acquires all the title of the judgment debtor, and that right of redemption is lost in a year, a purchaser, despite sections 703 and 706, relating to possession during period of redemption, is at the end of a year possessed of absolute title, and may quiet the same against the judgment debtor in suit for that purpose, though no deed has been issued.

2. Judgment $\Leftrightarrow$ 585(2)—Previous judgment against plaintiff bar to second action.

As under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 18, it is presumed all issues which might have been decided in a previous action between the same parties were disposed of, a previous judgment against a purchaser at execution sale, in an action to quiet title brought against the judgment debtor more than a year after sale, is a conclusive adjudication which will bar a subsequent action, notwithstanding at the time of the first suit to quiet title a deed had not been issued, for under sections 700 and 702 the purchaser had complete title, and on production of evidence thereof was entitled to recover regardless of lack of deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by P. J. Leaver against Samuel T. Smith and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. T. Kendrick, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

M. I. Grossman, of Los Angeles (Charles M. Ackerman, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this action to quiet title plaintiff had judgment and defendant appeals. The complaint was in the usual form appropriate to the character of the action. In addition to a general denial, the defendant made a special plea in his answer by alleging a former judgment between the parties for the same cause. That portion of the answer is as follows:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the * * * day of March, 1917, an action was commenced by the plaintiff in this court against each of these defendants, wherein it was alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of said property and wherein it was also alleged that the defendants, and each of the defendants, had no right, title, or interest in said property; that the said defendants appeared in said action and the said cause came on regularly for trial before said court on the 11th day of December, 1917, and thereupon said court duly made and gave judgment against the plaintiff and in favor of defendants, thereby adjudging that plaintiff take nothing in said action and that defendants recover their costs."

Samuel T. Smith is the only defendant interested, as the action was dismissed as to Anna May Smith, who was first named in the complaint as Jane Doe. The trial court made particular findings by way of showing the facts upon which the judgment was predicated. From these findings it appears that appellants here, in 1914, became a judgment debtor of one Leaver; that upon execution being levied against the real property herein involved, then belonging to appellants, a sale was made and the property was purchased by the plaintiff, the judgment creditor; that the execution sale was made on the 3d day of February, 1916; that no redemption of the premises having been made in the meantime, deed was delivered to the purchaser on the 11th day of December, 1917. As to the former judgment pleaded by appellants, the court made its findings as follows:

"That it is true that an action was commenced in March, 1917, by plaintiff in this action, and against defendant in this action, for the purpose of quieting title to the premises herein described; that all of the allegations contained in the further and separate answer to plaintiff's complaint, set out in the answer of defendants herein, are true."

Conclusions of law followed, wherein it was determined that the plaintiff should have a decree quieting his title to the property described in the complaint.

[1, 2] It is appellants' contention that the plea of the former judgment adjudicating the same matter between the same parties was sustained by the evidence, and that the court should have held that the plaintiff was estopped from re-asserting claim to the property described. No question is made as to the correctness of the findings of fact in their material parts. From such findings and from the undisputed evidence exhibited in the bill of exceptions we may summarize the occurrences material for consideration as follows: Execution sale of the defendants' property was made and certificate of sale was given and recorded on February 3, 1916; deed to the same was delivered December 11, 1917. Plaintiff's first action to quiet title was commenced (as appears from the court's findings) in March, 1917; trial of that action was had on December 11, 1917, and judgment entered on December 18, 1917. This action, being the same in form as the preceding action, to wit, to quiet title to the same property against the same defendants, was commenced on October 23, 1918, and judgment was rendered on January 21, 1919. While the evidence heard at the trial of the first action is not shown, we can surmise that the plaintiff was refused a decree in the first action because at the time the action was commenced a deed had not been issued to the property; the opinion of the trial judge evidently being—for it is emphasized here in the brief of respondent—that a cause of action to quiet title would not mature upon the execution sale until formal deed was issued; that conclusion being derived from the assumption that the purchaser at an execution sale, and until he secures a deed, obtains only an equitable title which is not sufficient to sustain a cause of action as against the holder of the legal title. Before considering further the question just suggested, attention is called to the fact that, as the execution sale was held and certificate of title issued on February 3, 1916, the full period for redemption had expired prior to the commencement of the first action in March, 1917. In other words, that at the time plaintiff commenced his first action the right of redemption had been lost in the judgment debtor, and the plaintiff was entitled, upon demand, to his deed. Code Civ. Proc. § 702. It is important to the question of the alleged estoppel which the first judgment worked against the plaintiff to inquire as to the character of title which the purchaser at an execution sale is endowed with from the time he receives his certificate of sale. Section 700 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

"Upon a sale of real property, the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto on the date of the levy of the execution thereon, where such judgment is not a lien upon such property. * * *"

The effect of this provision is to confer upon the purchaser full title, except that within the ensuing period of 12 months after sale an equity of redemption is possessed by the judgment debtor. When the full period of 12 months has elapsed there no longer exists any equity in the judgment debtor; hence the purchaser becomes possessed of an absolute title at that time. Such was the case here at the time plaintiff commenced his first action to quiet title to the real property. The issuance of a deed was not essential to the vesting of title in the plaintiff; nor was such deed necessary and indispensable evidence of the title of the plaintiff. Respondent has cited Knight v. Fair, 9 Cal. 117, which is favorable to his contention that upon the sale of real property under execution an equitable title only is conferred upon the purchaser. That case, however, is considered in Pollard v. Harlow, 138 Cal. 390, 71 Pac. 454, 648, and attention is called to the fact that Knight v. Fair was decided under the Practice Act when the state of the law was different from that which was carried into the Code. The court, in Pollard v. Harlow, supra, said:

"The language of section 700 of the Code of Civil Procedure is, that upon the sale of the property 'the purchaser is substituted to and acquires all the right, title, interest, and claim of the judgment debtor thereto,' which is to say unequivocally that he acquires the legal as well as the equitable title. The only qualifications are, that (when not a leasehold of less than two years' unexpired term) the property shall be 'subject to redemption'; that a deed shall be subsequently given (Code Civ. Proc. § 703); and that pending the time for redemption the possession shall remain with the defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 706). But no one of these qualifications is inconsistent with the vesting of the legal title in the purchaser. With regard to the first, the case is simply the familiar one of a legal title, defeasible upon the happening of a condition subsequent; and as to the second, the deed gives 'to the purchaser no new title to the land purchased by him, but is merely evidence that the title has become absolute.' Robinson v. Thornton, 102 Cal. 680."

As to the binding effect of the former judgment: That judgment was between the same parties as appeared in this suit; the cause of action was stated substantially in the same manner. In the first action plaintiff alleged ownership of the property and sought to quiet title against the claims of the defendants. Plaintiff was called upon there to furnish evidence of any title that he had, or be estopped from further asserting a claim based upon the same evidence.

"If the cause of action in which the judgment was rendered was the same as the cause of action in which the judgment is pleaded, and both actions have been brought to obtain relief at law or in equity upon the same cause of action, the last action is subject to the estoppel of the judgment in the former action. And the judgment as rendered in that action is conclusive upon all questions involved in the action and upon which it depends, or upon matters which, under the issues, might have been litigated and decided in the case (Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 306); and the presumption of law is that all such issues were actually heard and decided (subdivision 18, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.)." Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 132.

It therefore appears that the plaintiff, at the time he brought his former action, could have made proof of the sale under execution to him of the real property and the receipt of the certificate of sale. As that sale was had and certificate made and recorded on February 3, 1916, it would have appeared that at the time the former action was commenced no equity of redemption was left with the defendant; hence that the plaintiff had become possessed of an absolute title. In other words, it appears that plaintiff in the first action could have introduced precisely the same evidence as he introduced at the second trial to prove his title, with the one exception that at the second trial he offered the additional evidence of the deed issued to him. As we have before stated, we do not consider that the production of the deed was in any wise necessary to the proof of title of the plaintiff derived under the execution sale. His case was complete without the production of such a deed.

The situation, then, is that the first judgment was entered against the plaintiff upon the merits upon the same essential evidence that was received in the second case, and under such circumstances we have no doubt that the first judgment should be held to have adjudicated the rights of the parties to this action; hence the plaintiff is estopped from bringing the defendant a second time into court for the same cause. The first judgment was not appealed from, and at the time of the trial of this action (although not at the commencement of the action) had become final.

The judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California, May 18, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 16, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error § 1097(2)—Opinion on former appeal law of case.

A decision of the appellate court on a former appeal, a petition for hearing in Supreme Court being denied, was the law of the case on a subsequent appeal, even though the Supreme Court departed from the doctrine of the decision after judgment was entered on the remittitur.

2. Mechanics' liens § 132(8)—Work done by architect immaterial on question when work on building ceased.

Painting of window panels under direction of architect to protect them from cracking in the sun, by persons other than the contractor, was properly overlooked by court in determining when work on building ceased, especially where such work was trivial.

3. Mechanics' liens § 113(2)—Lien of stop notice subordinate to other liens.

The equitable garnishment occasioned by a stop notice served on owner under Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, attaches only to such sum as might be payable to the contractor after the extinguishment of liens.

4. Costs § 203—Defendants not "adverse parties," so as to require service of cost bill.

Where defendants took separate appeals, and remittitur provided, "Appellants to recover costs," appeals resulting in a modification of the judgment by the reduction thereof as to some defendants, and an increase as to one, the latter was not an "adverse party" to the other defendants, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, so as to require service on it of a cost bill.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasley, Judge.

Action by A. L. Hubbard and others against A. Jurian, G. W. Odell, and the Maryland Casualty Company. From an adverse judgment, and an order refusing to strike out a cost bill, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 Pac. 1093.

Ralph C. McComish, of San Jose, for appellants.

F. H. Bloomingdale, of San Jose, and James Walter Scott, of San Francisco (James J. Harrington, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

LOFORD, Judge pro tem. Two appeals are involved here. Plaintiffs appeal from the portion of the judgment foreclosing the mechanics' liens of some of their assignors, and denying relief for the claim of Hubbard & Carmichael, one of plaintiffs' assignors. Plaintiffs also appeal from the order of the trial court refusing to strike out the cost bill for costs on a former appeal.

The present plaintiffs are the executors of the original plaintiff, now deceased. When this case was originally tried, the judgment in favor of the then plaintiff included the Hubbard & Carmichael lien filed July 2, 1913. The defendants each appealed from the judgment and order denying a new trial. On this appeal the judgment was modified in certain respects, including the disallowance of this particular lien, on account of the claim of lien having been filed too late. Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 Pac. 1093. Upon the going down of the remittitur, the trial court entered judgment in accordance with its directions upon the same findings of fact, but containing recitals of the appeal and decision on appeal. Thereupon plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was denied, and then took this appeal from a portion of the judgment.

Appellants, in seeking a reversal of the judgment, contend (1) that the finding that Odell and Jurian were estopped from claiming that the work had been abandoned prior to March 10, 1913, by reason of having alleged in their answer that the abandonment occurred on or about that date should prevail over the finding that the contractor ceased from all labor on the building on March 1, 1913, which it is argued (2) is not supported by the evidence. Appellant also urges (3) that Hubbard & Carmichael Bros., having filed a stop notice under section 1184, Code of Civil Procedure, were entitled to be paid out of the money in the hands of the owners belonging to the contractor, which was found to be $948; and (4) that a laborer or materialman may recover from the surety of the contractor without having perfected a lien.

[1] The decision on the former appeal of this case disposes of most, if not all, of the points, and therefore is the law of the case with respect to the question decided on that appeal. The doctrine of the decision on the former appeal in this case on the fourth point above urged by appellants has been departed from by the Supreme Court, since the judgment herein was entered on the remittitur, in the later case of General Electric Co. v. American Bonding Co. (Sup.) 182 Pac. 444, notwithstanding that a petition for hearing in the Supreme Court of the former appeal of Hubbard v. Jurian, supra, was denied by that court. But our decision on the former appeal must still be considered to be the law as far as this case is concerned. It is a final judgment as to that point, and for all purposes of this particular case it remains established, whether it may be afterwards thought to be right or wrong. With respect to this point on appeal, appellants recognize that this court is bound by its former decision.

But with respect to the other three points on appeal appellants assert that there is no law of the case. First, they point out that in the first decision the word "estoppel" is not used, and that therefore their first point is still open for decision. We do not agree with this. Although the word "estoppel" is not used, as is claimed, yet the decision fully discusses this point, and decides that the defendants' pleading as a whole is of such a nature that it does not estop them, and that the finding as to the date of abandonment stands. We quote from the decision as follows:

"It is contended upon behalf of the respondent Hubbard that the claim of lien of Hubbard & Carmichael which was filed on July 2, 1913, was within time, because it was filed within 120 days from March 10, 1913, 'on or about' which date the answer alleged work on the building was abandoned. In this behalf it is urged that this date, by reason of the averments of the answer, was admitted by the defendants to be the date when work ceased upon the building, and that as a consequence the trial court should have accepted that date as the time of cessation of labor despite evidence to the contrary, and that the finding of the trial court that work ceased upon the building on March 1, 1913, was, in so far as the Hubbard & Carmichael claim was concerned, unauthorized, and cannot therefore be permitted to prevail over the admitted fact. In support of this contention we are cited to the familiar rule that an admission made in the pleading is binding on the party making it, that a fact admitted by the pleadings of an opponent need not be proved, and that any evidence introduced contrary to such admission must be disregarded by the trial court when making its finding. In our opinion this rule has no application to the situation presented by the pleadings in the present case. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that his assignor, Hubbard & Carmichael, had filed their claim of lien within the statutory time after constructive completion of the building. Bloom's Law of Mechanics, Supp. p. 258. The answer of the defendants squarely and sufficiently denied the allegation of the complaint that the building was completed on June 20, 1913. This denial made it incumbent upon the plaintiff to proffer proof showing that the claim of lien had been filed within time. Moreover the phrase 'on or about March 10th,' as used in the answer, is indefinite and uncertain, and might therefore consistently mean several days before or after that date, and, inasmuch as the exact date of the completion of the building or the cessation of work thereon was a material fact to be determined by the court below as a foundation for the allowance or rejection of the claims of lien, it cannot be said that the allegation in question was such a definite admission of fact as would preclude the necessity for the taking of evidence or the making a finding thereon. The finding of the trial court that work on the building ceased on March 1, 1913, and that such cessation continued for more than a period of 30 days, being sufficiently supported by evidence, it follows that the Hubbard & Carmichael lien, which was filed July 2, 1913 (123 days after March 1, 1913), was just 3 days too late, and therefore should not have been allowed."

[2] It is thus stated in the decision that the finding of the date of cessation of labor is sufficiently supported by the evidence. Appellants contend that, as they were respondents on that appeal, they could not attack that finding at that time, but that, being appellants now, they may do so. However this may be, we are still of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding that the contractor ceased from all labor upon the contracts on March 1, 1913. The work done on March 4, 1913, was painting window panels under direction of the architect to protect them from cracking in the sun, and was trivial in amount. It was properly overlooked by the trial court, not so much because it was trivial, but because it was not done on the contract, nor by the contractor. This amount of painting should be compared with any steps taken by the owner looking to the protection of his property from deterioration, as distinguished from improving it constructively, by either the contractor, or owner, or going ahead in any manner with the contemplated work.

[3] Appellants contend that the third point, touching the stop notice, was discussed in the former decision only with respect to the premature payment made to the contractor; that this court can now decide that this stop notice should be given effect, operating, not upon the premature payment of $1,315, but on the money remaining in the hands of the owners and due the contractor at the time of the service of the withhold notice. Appellants state that the trial court found this amount to be $948. There is no finding to this effect directly, but it is arrived at by computation. The contract prices were $5,260 and $3,600, which, together with extras, make a total of $9,222. The owners paid installments of $900, $1,315, and a further sum of $1,315, together with the sum of $4,744.59, to complete the work after abandonment, making a total of $8,274.59 cost to the owner without paying liens. The difference between this cost and the contract price, with extras, is $948, ignoring cents.

Is this amount available to plaintiffs under the stop notice, in face of the fact that there are valid liens greatly in excess of this sum? The judgment distributes this sum proportionately among the several valid lien claimants, and also gives them judgment against the sureties on the statutory bond filed by defendant Maryland Casualty Company. Therefore, while the amount of $948 was due the contractor under the terms of his contract in one sense, it is not in another. He will never receive it, and is not entitled to it. Code Civ. Proc. § 1193.

It was said in Hughes Bros. v. Hoover, 3 Cal. App. 145, 84 Pac. 681:

"The contention of appellant that it was entitled to a personal judgment against the owner, growing out of the notice to withhold money, is not tenable. The equitable garnishment, which is said to be occasioned by such notice, attaches only to such sum as might be payable to the contractor after the extinguishment of the liens, for until such liens are extinguished no sum is payable from the owner to the contractor."

Plaintiffs, by reason of the stop notice, therefore, were not entitled to judgment against the owner, nor to be paid out of this fund to the exclusion in whole or in part of the valid lien claimants. This disposes of all the points of the appellants on the appeal from the judgment.

[4] The appeal from the order of the trial court refusing to strike out the cost bill on appeal is based on the fact that the defendants Jurian and Odell did not serve the cost bill on the defendant Maryland Casualty Company as well as upon plaintiffs. The two defendants were appellants there, having taken separate appeals, and plaintiffs' predecessor was the respondent. The remittitur provided, "The appellants to recover costs on this appeal." It is claimed that, inasmuch as the modification of the judgment resulted in a reduction of the judgment against appellants Odell and Jurian, and an increased judgment against appellant Maryland Casualty Company, said last-named appellant was in fact an "adverse party" to its coappellants Odell and Jurian, as that term is used in Code of Civil Procedure, § 1033. The remittitur did not allow one appellant to recover costs from the other, but only from the respondent (appellants here). The appellants filing the cost bill did not ask for judgment for costs against their coappellant.

We must hold, therefore, that those appellants were not adverse parties to each other, that it was not necessary that the cost bill be served on the Maryland Casualty Company, and that the trial court properly refused to strike it out on that ground.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LAWSON v. TURLOCK UNION HIGH SCHOOL DIST. et al. (Civ. 2179.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 28, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 24, 1920.)

1. Schools and school districts ⇨69—School district trustees may change location of high school in a city.

Under Pol. Code, § 1742, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1086, a board of trustees of a school district may change the location of a high school located in an incorporated city.

2. Constitutional law ⇨48—Statute not declared unconstitutional, except for most cogent reasons.

A strong intendment exists in favor of an act of the Legislature, and a court should declare it unconstitutional only for the most cogent reasons.

3. Statutes ⇨93(6)—Statute permitting trustees to change location of high school in city not invalid.

Pol. Code, § 1742, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1086, is not obnoxious to Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 28, which provides that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws prescribing the powers and duties of officers of school districts, in that it permits trustees to change the location of a high school in an incorporated city; the classification being reasonable, and not arbitrary.

Application by E. W. Lawson for certiorari to review action of Jesse Jaderberg and others, as Trustees of Turlock Union High School District. Writ denied in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in the Supreme Court.

Hawkins & Hawkins, of Modesto, for petitioner.

L. J. Maddux, of Modesto, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an application by petitioner for a writ of certiorari to above-named respondents to review the action of said respondents, as trustees of Turlock Union High School District, in changing the site of the high school from its former position in said city to another about one mile distant. It is contended by petitioner that the trustees exceeded their powers in ordering the change. Although the record in the matter is somewhat voluminous, the actual question to be determined is very narrow.

Turlock is an incorporated city, and prior to October, 1919, said high school district owned and maintained a high school upon certain premises within said city which premises had been regularly selected and designated for that purpose. The union district covers an extensive area of territory outside of the corporate limits of said city and includes said city. In October, 1919, said trustees by a majority vote changed said high school from its former position to a tract of about 23 acres situated in another part of the city. In February, 1920, petitioner herein commenced an action in injunction in the superior court in an effort to restrain said trustees from proceeding with said proposed change. Judgment was rendered against him, and his appeal is now pending therefrom.

[1] 1. Waiving the question whether petitioner has a speedy remedy by appeal, the decisive point against him is that the amendment to section 1742 of the Political Code, enacted in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 1086), justifies the board in its action. The portion of said section relevant to this inquiry now reads as follows:

"With the following exception, no change of location of any high school when once established, shall be made except upon a petition to the superintendent of schools who has jurisdiction of the high school district, * * * and then only upon the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the high school district voting at an election called by the superintendent of schools, for that purpose. Such election shall be called and held, and the returns thereof made to the superintendent of schools, in the same manner as in the case of the election for the formation of the district: Provided, however, that when any location has been once established in any of said districts, and said location lies within the corporate limits of any incorporated city or town, any change of location within the corporate limits of said city or town may be made upon any such change of location receiving the vote of a majority of the board of trustees of any such district whenever a new building is to be erected."

The proviso is the portion added by the amendment of 1919. Its terms are clearly broad enough to justify the action taken by the trustees if the act is open to no constitutional objection.

[2, 3] 2. It is claimed, however, that the amendment is obnoxious to that provision of the Constitution which provides that the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws prescribing the powers and duties of officers of school districts. Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 28. Admittedly the amendment does prescribe the powers and duties of school officers. If the amendment is neither local nor special, it is immaterial whether the term "school districts," as used in the above-cited provision of the Constitution, is broad enough to include high school districts. A strong intentment exists in favor of an act of the Legislature, and a court should declare it unconstitutional only for the most cogent reasons. The amendment in question applies to all high school districts in the state that have a school building within the limits of an incorporated city. This means, potentially, every high school district in the state, for if it has no school building within an incorporated city to-day it may have one to-morrow. Classification that is reasonable, and not arbitrary, does not vitiate a statute. 6 Ruling Cases, 372. The distinction established by the Legislature is not an arbitrary one. There are sufficient differences between a location in a city and one in the country to justify the classification established in the amendment. Conceding that the change of site from one point to another in the same city is a change of location, within the purview of the amendment, the fact that such change could be for only a limited distance, while in the country it might be for many miles, is itself a sufficient difference in conditions to save the amendment. Moreover, the opportunity for securing favorable sites within a city is manifestly less than in the open country. In dealing with many owners of a block within a city, flexibility of power to contract for options, wider discretion, and greater facility for rapidity of action are necessary. In the country, a removal to a new location, miles distant from a former site, might inconvenience large numbers of pupils, while, ordinarily, the greatest possible removal within a city could not greatly inconvenience any one. In the country, serious or dangerous obstacles to travel, even though the removal be for only a short distance, might operate to deny the benefits of the school to many persons, while such a result is scarcely possible in a city.

These distinctions exist. They are sufficient to justify the classification established in the amendment. That they are sufficient, in the opinion of the law-making body, to demand such classification, is answered by the adoption of the amendment.

The writ is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in bank denying hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the district court of appeal of the third appellate district is denied.

We deem it necessary to say, however, that the decision must not be taken as a precedent for the proposition that certiorari will lie to review decisions of a tribunal, board or officer, not made in the exercise of judicial functions (Code Civ. Proc. § 1068), nor for the proposition that the order of the trustees of a union high school district changing the location of a high school building is other than a legislative or executive act. *Hopping v. BAR DUE v. COX. (Civ. 3326.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨761—Assignments of error insufficient.

Objections in a brief to the judgment and actions of the trial court, merely stated without citation of authority or any argument beyond bare statement of point, present nothing for consideration on appeal.

2. Adjoining landowners ⇨10(3) — Evidence showing erection of high fence was malicious.

In an action under St. 1913, p. 342, to have a fence erected on defendant's premises declared a private nuisance, evidence held to warrant a finding that the fence was maliciously erected for the purpose of annoying plaintiff.

3. Adjoining landowners ⇨10(3)—Spite fence statute constitutional.

St. 1913, p. 342, providing that any fence or other structure in the nature of a fence, unnecessarily exceeding 10 feet in height, maliciously erected or maintained for the purpose of annoying owner of adjoining property shall be deemed a private nuisance which may be abated, is not unconstitutional.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by N. Bar Due against Sarah Cox. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur E. Nathanson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. H. Morris, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to have a certain fence, wholly erected and maintained upon the premises of the defendant, declared a private nuisance, and removed forthwith, or reduced to a height not exceeding 10 feet. He also prayed that the defendant be enjoined and restrained from preventing or interfering with plaintiff, should plaintiff undertake to abate and remove the fence, or go upon the property of the defendant for that purpose. The action was predicated upon the alleged ground that said fence was maliciously erected and maintained to annoy plaintiff, and any of his tenants who might occupy his flats, and upon the theory that the fence excluded the light and air of plaintiff's tenants, to the annoyance and prejudice of plaintiff, and to the damage of plaintiff's property. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. Defendant then introduced considerable testimony. On submission of the case judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

The action is brought by the plaintiff under the provisions of the act of the Legislature of May 28, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 342), which provides that any fence or other structure in the nature of a fence, unnecessarily exceeding 10 feet in height, maliciously erected or maintained for the purpose of annoying the owner or occupant of adjoining property, shall be deemed a private nuisance, for the abatement of which such owner or occupant may enforce the remedies prescribed in the sections of the Civil Code.

[1] Appellant in his opening brief specifies some eleven points as "questions involved in this action." He presents, however, but two with that particularity which invites our consideration. The remaining objections to the judgment and action of the trial court are merely stated without citation of authority, or any argument beyond the bare statement of the point. As an example we cite appellant's sixth point, "Errors of Law in Denying Defendant's Motion for a Nonsuit." In his brief, under the title "Motion for Nonsuit," he merely quotes verbatim the reporter's transcript of the motion, made in the court below, and the court's ruling, without a single comment. At another point in the brief appellant inserts the heading "Insufficiency of the Evidence to Sustain the Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and the Judgment," followed by some 77 pages of extracts from reporter's transcript, without argument, comment, or suggestion as to why this testimony is insufficient. In his closing brief appellant merely asserts that there is "no substantial conflict" in the testimony. We are not called upon to consider points so stated. Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 386, 108 Pac. 278; Dore v. Southern Pacific Co., 163 Cal. 182, 124 Pac. 817.

In view of the importance of the legal questions involved, however, we have examined the contention that the act of the Legislature, under which the suit was brought, is unconstitutional, and have read much of the evidence in the transcript, to determine for ourselves its sufficiency to sustain the finding of the court, that the fence in question unnecessarily exceeds 10 feet in height, and was maliciously erected, and is so maintained, for the purpose of annoying the plaintiff and his tenants.

[2] The plaintiff and the defendant are adjoining property owners. Some years prior to the commencement of the suit the plaintiff moved an old dwelling to the rear of his lot, so that it practically abuts on defendant's property. The latter, thereafter, erected, wholly within the line of her own property, the fence in question, but so close to the rear of plaintiff's structure that it effectively shut off the view from the lower windows of plaintiff's house and obstructs the light and air thereof. Defendant has grown vines over this tight board fence, which she waters at times, and the testimony is that the water is thrown through the cracks of the fence, and wets the interior of the lower flat of plaintiff's premises. Defendant has constantly prevented workmen engaged in repairing plaintiff's premises from in any way going upon her lot and has exhibited an embittered feeling and a defiant attitude toward the plaintiff and his tenants. From photographs and the evidence of witnesses it is apparent that the fence effectually boards up the lower windows of plaintiff's lower flat. There does not seem to be any necessity for it being maintained at a height in excess of 10 feet. This is evidenced by the fact that the fence on the property line of defendant adjoining another owner is of a different character and not so high. The fact of its peculiar construction, the way it is maintained in front of plaintiff's property, the attitude of defendant as testified to by various witnesses, and the whole circumstances surrounding its erection and maintenance, plainly indicate a malice on the part of defendant toward the plaintiff. This, we think, was the only logical conclusion to be drawn from the evidence, and was the ultimate fact for the trial court to determine, in the light of these circumstances.

[3] In support of her contention that the act is unconstitutional, defendant relies upon two decisions of the Supreme Court of California, construing the act of the Legislature of March 9, 1885, "regulating the height of division fences and partition walls in cities and towns." This act is set out in full in the case of Western Granite & Marble Co. v. Knickerbocker, 103 Cal. at page 114, 37 Pac. 192. The gist of that decision is that the fence there under consideration was a division fence and that it was not competent for the Legislature to vest in the adjoining proprietor the power to prevent his neighbor from building such a structure on his own property, provided it is not a nuisance. The other case is Ingwersen v. Barry, 118 Cal. 342, 50 Pac. 536, which is based upon the Western Granite Case. The act we are now construing was, however, passed after these decisions, and, judging by their context, with the purpose of supplying the very element necessary to render it effective, which was missing from the former statute—the malicious maintenance of a private nuisance. Under the authority of Flaherty v. Moran, 81 Mich. 52, 45 N. W. 381, 8 L. R. A. 183, 21 Am. St. Rep. 510, Rideout v. Knox, 148 Mass. 368, 19 N. E. 391, 2 L. R. A. 81, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560, and Horan v. Byrnes, 72 N. H. 93, 54 Atl. 945, 62 L. R. A. 602, 101 Am. St. Rep. 670, we believe it to be constitutional.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County.

Action by M. H. Harris against Bessie M. Burt, a widow. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Appeal dismissed.

R. T. Lightfoot, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Arthur Wright, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. Motion to dismiss appeal. From the record before us it appears that a judgment was entered against the defendant here in the superior court of Los Angeles county on the 21st day of June, 1919, for a total sum of $412.74; that on the 3d day of July, 1919, a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court was filed by the defendant in that court; that at the same time and place defendant also filed a demand for transcript, in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and gave an undertaking on appeal, with stay of execution, duly approved by the clerk of that court, as well as the undertaking provided for by section 953b, Code of Civil Procedure, in the sum of $100, agreeing to pay to the clerk the cost of preparing such transcript, which undertaking was likewise duly approved by the clerk; and that thereafter the clerk prepared what is usually denominated as the "clerk's transcript," which transcript was regularly filed in the superior court. It also appears that the official reporter who reported the case, Mr. Henry Henderson, received no notice requiring the preparation of a phonographic report of the trial until Saturday, July 26, 1919, and until the receipt of such notice he had no knowledge that defendant intended to appeal the case. On Monday, July 28, 1919, the official reporter wrote, signed, and mailed, with postage prepaid, a letter addressed to defendant's attorney of record, and who appeared before this court in opposition to this motion, which letter was in words and figures as follows:

"Room 560, Court House, Los Angeles, Cal., July 28, 1919. Mr. R. T. Lightfoot, Attorney at Law, 916 Washington Bldg., City—Dear Sir: Saturday noon your notice of appeal and request for transcript in M. H. Harris v. Bessie

M. Burt, No. B71930, was handed to me, being the first notice I had had that you desired a transcript, and now, at my first opportunity, I have looked up the case and made an estimate of the cost thereof. The estimate of my fees for the reporter's transcript on appeal is $53.20. If you desire an office copy, the fee will be one-half more, or $79.80. I notice your notice was filed July 3d, but if you have complied with your part of the statutory requirement, the provision as to time of filing transcript being, as I understand, merely directory, your client's rights would, I assume, not suffer by the delay. Having had no communication from you or any one about it until Saturday, I am not to blame. If you wish me to go ahead with the work, upon prepayment of my fees, I will do so promptly. Respectfully yours, [Signed] Henry Henderson, Official Reporter."

The statements contained in this letter are not denied. They are without conflict. Mr. Henderson, in his affidavit into which the foregoing letter is incorporated, says that he heard nothing further regarding the transcript or the proposed appeal "until just recently, when he was informed by plaintiff's attorney of the circumstances of the present motion to dismiss the appeal." Nothing has ever been done by appellant, or any one else, except as above stated. There has not been filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court, or with the clerk of this court, any transcript, brief, or other papers, except those in connection with the motion now before us.

The motion is based upon two grounds: (1) That the transcript of the record in said action has not been filed; and (2) that no points and authorities have been filed. The motion is based upon the certificate of the clerk of the superior court in which said cause was tried, and the affidavit of respondent's attorney.

It is contended by appellant that, having done all that the law requires in order to be entitled to the benefit of an appeal under the so-called "alternative method," she should not be made to suffer because of the neglect, failure, or refusal of the clerk to perform his duty. In this we quite agree. But such things do sometimes happen in the best regulated offices. When they do, and when this fact is known, as in the instant case, by the appealing party, the latter cannot sit idly by, neglecting, failing, or absolutely refusing to avail himself of any of the several provisions of law to compel the performance by the proper officer of his duty in such case, and by such neglect, failure, or refusal succeed in depriving the opposing litigant of the fruits of a righteous judgment (if such it be), and escape the granting of a motion to dismiss the appeal under such circumstances.

There are on file before us two certificates by the county clerk of Los Angeles county. By one of these it is shown that the judgment attempted to be appealed from was entered on June 9, 1919. By the other the same judgment is shown to have been entered on June 21, 1919. Which certificate is correct, we do not assume to say, but have given appellant the benefit of our doubt, and have accepted the latter as showing the correct date of entry.

[1, 2] Section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, among other things, that—

"Any person desiring to appeal from any judgment * * * to the Supreme Court or any of the District Courts of Appeal, may * * * file with the clerk of the court from whose judgment * * * said appeal is taken * * * a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed therefrom, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony * * * be made up and prepared. Said notice must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment."

With this provision in mind, there being nothing before us to show when, if at all, appellant was served with notice of entry of the judgment from which she attempts to appeal, and the notice of appeal, as we have already seen, having been filed on July 3, 1919, it will be assumed that such notice was filed as by said section provided. From the certificates of the clerk referred to, it appears that no transcript of the phonographic report of the trial has been prepared or filed "in the office of the county clerk, as demanded, and for which bond was given, and the time for settling and approving same has expired."

There is conflict in the evidence as to whether appellant's attorney ever made demand on the court reporter for such transcript, except by filing such notices and undertakings with the clerk as stated. Appellant's attorney says that he did make such demand; while the reporter, on the other hand, says that appellant's attorney "has not communicated with affiant, either verbally or in writing, relative to said transcript." We think, however, that this is immaterial. At any rate, we are certain that for a long time, taking the affidavit of appellant's attorney at its full face value, the latter well knew that such transcript had not been prepared, and that the reason for it was according to his own statement, as set forth in his affidavit:

"That said Henderson refused at all times to deliver said stenographic report unless he should have been paid in advance therefor by the defendant and appellant." (Italics ours.)

"Where an appeal is taken under the alternative method provided by sections 953a and 953b of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is the duty of the stenographic reporter to make a transcript of the report of the trial within twenty days after the notice of appeal has been given" and the bond provided for in said sections has been filed, "and to file such transcript with the clerk. He cannot refuse to so file because his fees remain unpaid." Gjurich v. Fieg, 160 Cal. 331, 116 Pac. 745.

Rule 2 of the Supreme Court (176 Pac. vii), provides that—

"The appellant in a civil action shall, within forty days after an appeal is perfected, except as hereinafter stated, serve and file the printed transcript."

Following this is a provision covering the procedure where the appeal is taken by the method adopted in the case at bar. Section 3 of that rule provides that—

"The time above limited may be extended by written stipulation, or by order, based on affidavit, showing good cause therefor."

Section 953a, supra, provides that—

"Upon receiving said notice it shall be the duty of the court to require the stenographic reporter thereof to transcribe fully and completely the phonographic report of the trial." (Italics ours.)

Section 1085, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a writ of mandate—

"may be issued * * * to any * * * person, to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station. * * *"

Here, then, are indicated various methods which appellant might have pursued, and by so doing avoid her present unfortunate situation, the first of which would have cost nothing but a few moments for the preparation of the necessary papers, and their service upon the stenographer. The second would probably have produced the desired result with but little inconvenience or expense on the part of appellant. For we cannot believe that any stenographer would disregard the order of the judge in whose department he was reporting, particularly upon such judge calling his attention to the case of Gjurich v. Fieg, supra. The latter method—writ of mandate—without doubt would have resulted satisfactorily.

With these facts before us, and considering the same in the light of the case above cited (where the Supreme Court, in intimating what might be considered the proper procedure, said: "In this view of the law it was, of course, within the power of the appellant to have had mandate issued against the stenographic reporter to compel him to file his transcript with the clerk as the law contemplates, and in ordinary cases appellant's failure to do this within a reasonable time might be construed to be such lack of diligence as to justify the dismissal of an appeal")—that case having been decided July 1, 1911, more than eight years ago—we think that a denial of respondent's motion would be a miscarriage of justice, and would transcend the limits of both precedent and reason.

[3] It was not to respondent's interest to take any steps other than those taken here.

Appellant cannot in one breath insist that she believes her attempted appeal to be well taken and in the next that it is immaterial to her whether the stenographer ever prepares and files such transcript. If it be contended that appellant had the right to await the pleasure of the stenographer, we answer that in availing herself of such right she must use it in such a way as not to infringe upon the rights of respondent here. There being, as we have seen, legal methods by at least one of which appellant could have compelled the reporter to act, and failing or refusing to avail herself thereof, she cannot now be permitted to take advantage of her own neglect and by so doing defeat this motion. In our opinion the legal maxim, "The law helps the vigilant, before those who sleep on their rights," applies here.

It is therefore held that because of the facts with which we are confronted, and for the reasons herein expressed, the motion presented must be granted.

The appeal is dismissed.

CRAIG v. GOMES et al. (Civ. 3347.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 25, 1920.)

Limitation of actions §48(7)—Junior mortgage not prior where senior mortgagee in possession, though mortgage barred by limitations.

Where mortgagors sold mortgaged property and took second mortgage thereon, and where purchasers sold property to holders of first mortgage, who took possession before their first mortgage became due, mortgagor's assignee of second mortgage, on foreclosure thereof, after first mortgage, was barred by limitations, and, while holders thereof were in possession of land, was not entitled to priority over first mortgage because of its being outlawed, since mortgagees in possession could not be ejected nor interfered with in any manner until payment of mortgage debt, even though mortgage was barred by limitations.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by H. S. Craig against L. R. Gomes and others. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, in pro. per.

Sans & Hudson, of Watsonville, for respondents.

KOFORD, Judge pro tem. The appeal is on the judgment roll, and the following statement of facts is taken from the findings:

J. L. Rankin (plaintiff's assignor) and his wife, on July 12, 1913, executed a $3,000 mortgage due in one year, 1914, to Lillian R. Higman. This mortgage was assigned by the mortgagee and her successors several times, and came at last, on January 5, 1914, to defendants L. R. Gomes and Mary Gomes, his wife. After the making of said mortgage Rankin and wife transferred or sold the mortgaged premises to James Lomas, his wife, and William R. Orr, and the said grantees either coincidentally or later (the findings do not show which) executed to said Rankin a second mortgage on the property for $1,500 on May 4, 1914. This is the mortgage which plaintiff, as the assignee of said Rankin and wife, foreclosed in the court below. On September 11, 1916, the Lomases and said Orr, who had purchased from the Rankins as aforesaid, conveyed the property to defendant L. R. Gomes and Mary Gomes. Thereupon Gomes and wife were the owners of the property, and also the mortgagees in the first mortgage, and the mortgage had not then outlawed. Then on September 29, 1916, Mary Gomes transferred to her husband, L. R. Gomes, all her interest, both in the property as a part owner, and in the said $3,000 mortgage, as mortgagee. The defendant L. R. Gomes has been the owner and in possession ever since the last-named date. It is therefore to be seen that the defendant went into possession before his mortgage outlawed.

This suit by plaintiff to foreclose the second mortgage of $1,500 was commenced shortly after the first mortgage had become barred by the statute of limitations. The decree of foreclosure provides that the first mortgage of $3,000, although barred by the statute of limitations, is a first lien and prior to the lien of plaintiff's $1,500 mortgage.

The sole question on appeal raised by plaintiff is that the first mortgage should not have been given a priority over his mortgage on account of its being outlawed.

Plaintiff does not contend that there has been a merger, and merger is not applicable under the facts. See Anglo-California Bank v. Field, 146 Cal. 644, 80 Pac. 1080, and 154 Cal. 513, 98 Pac. 267. He contends for the application of the principle that a junior mortgagee may invoke the aid of the statute of limitations against a prior mortgage, even though the mortgagor of the prior mortgage, as between himself and the mortgagee, may have waived its protection. Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185; California Bank v. Brooks, 126 Cal. 198, 59 Pac. 302; Brandenstein v. Johnson, 140 Cal. 29, 73 Pac. 744.

The defendant contends for the application of the principle that a mortgagee in possession, even though his mortgage becomes barred, cannot be ejected nor interfered with in any manner by the mortgagor until the mortgage debt is paid. Spect v. Spect, 88 Cal.

We think that this is the correct principle to apply here. Rankin (plaintiff's assignor) is the very man who executed the first mortgage. In morals and equity he should pay it before he is given any judgment which may result in ousting the first mortgagee. The mortgagee in possession went into possession before his mortgage became barred. The second mortgage was executed while the first was a valid subsisting first lien, not barred, and not even due.

The cases relied upon by appellant do not deal with a first mortgagee in possession, and their doctrine cannot be extended to a case of this kind in violation of such plain equitable considerations as exist here. While plaintiff here is the assignee of Rankin, he has no greater rights than his assignor. Furthermore, the doctrine of the cases last cited has been extended to the assignee of the original mortgagor and is not limited to the mortgagor himself. Cameron v. Ah Quong, 175 Cal. 377, 165 Pac. 961.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ENNIS-BROWN CO. v. RICHVALE LAND CO. (Civ. 2053.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 17, 1920.)

Depositories ⇐4—Depository bound to return a "special deposit."

Where purchaser of crop of corn sent an advance payment therefor to crop mortgagee "to apply on purchase" of the corn, and the crop was a short one, so that the advance payment was, in fact an overpayment in part, the crop purchaser was entitled to recover the amount of the overpayment from the crop mortgagee, under Civ. Code, §§ 1814, 1835, as to depositaries; the deposit being not a general deposit but a special deposit, that is, one limited to a specific and definite purpose, and the title not passing to the mortgagee as it would have done if the deposit had been general in its nature.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Special Deposit.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by the Ennis-Brown Company against the Richvale Land Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. O. Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.

Victor L. Hatfield and W. H. Hatfield, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. September 14, 1917, the Ennis-Brown Company entered into a contract with W. B. Linn & Son whereby the former agreed to purchase the Egyptian corn growing upon the land occupied by the latter and owned by them. The agreed price was $50 per ton, "free on board boat," and it was stipulated that an advance payment of $4,500 should be made. At the time the crop was estimated at 320 tons, but it actually yielded 115,013 pounds, amounting at said price to the sum of $2,875.30. Plaintiff having advanced said sum of $4,500 was therefore entitled to the return of $1,624.70. The question in the case is whether the cause of action in favor of plaintiff for this amount is legally against said Linn & Son or defendant Richvale Land Company. On September 27, 1917, defendant wrote plaintiff stating in effect that the former understood that the latter had purchased the corn crop of Linn & Son and that said Richvale Land Company had a crop mortgage on said crop and would expect any advancement of the price to be made to said company. On October 1, 1917, plaintiff, not referring to defendant's letter of September 27, wrote defendant as follows:

"Richvale Land Company, Chico, California—Gentlemen: As per instructions from Mr. Axtell, we herewith inclose you our check of $4,500 to apply on purchase price of Egyptian corn bought from W. B. Linn & Son. Kindly have Mr. Linn indorse check in your favor and this will keep the record straight at your end. Please acknowledge receipt of the check and oblige.

"Very truly, Ennis-Brown Company."

The next day defendant answered the letter, as follows:

"We acknowledge receipt of your check for $4,500 to apply on purchase of Egyptian corn from W. B. Linn & Son. Mr. Linn will begin to thresh the first of next week.

"Very truly, Richvale Land Company."

The foregoing correspondence shows the foundation for plaintiff's claim against defendant for the balance remaining after the purchase price of said corn was paid.

We appreciate all that has been said by appellant as to the essentials of a contract. Of course, the parties must agree upon its terms before it becomes a legal and binding obligation. A proposition made by one party but not assented to by the other is of no avail. These elementary principles need no discussion, but we are entirely satisfied that appellant has made a wrong application of them. We may admit that the parties herein might have adopted more apt language to express their intention; at least, they could have been more definite and explicit, but we must not expect such precision and accuracy as would characterize formal instruments deliberately prepared by a capable attorney. However, by fair intentment and common understanding of the terms employed, the letter and the reply being considered together, the correspondence amounts to this: Plaintiff, having sent to defendant the sum of $4,500, directs that it be applied to a single and definite purpose, namely, the "purchase of Egyptian corn bought from W. B. Linn & Son." There was no uncertainty therein. It was understood what purchase was referred to and what price was to be paid. This direction, of course, excluded the application of the money to any other purpose. This is according to a familiar rule of logic. The direction would not have been changed in effect if the plaintiff had directed that the money be applied "on the purchase of said corn and used for no other purpose." The defendant accepted the money and agreed to use it for that purpose. It is true that there was no express declaration that "we agree to apply the money to that purpose," but this is necessarily implied in the statement, "We acknowledge receipt of your check for $4,500 to apply on purchase of Egyptian corn from W. B. Linn & Son." Would the case for plaintiff be any stronger if defendant had written: "We acknowledge receipt of your check for $4,500 and we will apply it on the purchase of Egyptian corn from W. B. Linn & Son." The acceptance of the money for a definite purpose carries the implication that it would be used for that purpose. This seems too plain to require argument. The money, therefore, having been accepted for a definite and specific object, and the purpose having been accomplished, what is the obligation of the defendant as to the residue, which was not needed for the purchase of the corn? There can hardly be any difference of opinion as to that question. The residue belonged to plaintiff, and it was the legal and moral duty of defendant to return it to the owner.

We need not quibble as to the proper legal terminology to characterize the relation of the parties. In a general sense, though, it is proper to say that a trust was created by express agreement, and it imposed upon defendant the obligation to pursue the course we have indicated. More specifically stated, the Richvale Land Company became a voluntary depositary within the meaning of section 1814 of the Civil Code, providing:

"A voluntary deposit is made by one giving to another, with his consent, the possession of personal property to keep for the benefit of the former, or of a third party. The person giving is called the depositor, and the person receiving the depositary."

As to the use to which the deposit may be put, necessarily the will of the depositor controls. However, the Legislature, in section 1835 of the Civil Code, has recognized this limitation in the following language:

"A depositary may not use the thing deposited, or permit it to be used, for any purpose, without the consent of the depositor."

Herein the only consent granted by plaintiff to defendant was to apply the money "on the purchase of Egyptian corn bought from W. B. Linn & Son." The depositary, therefore, had authority to use it for no other purpose.

Appellant makes the mistake of supposing that the case involves a general deposit, whereas, we are dealing with a special deposit. It is special because it was limited to a specific and definite purpose. The title did not pass to defendant as it would have done if the deposit had been general in its nature. The deposit constituted a bailment with the title remaining in the bailor, and the bailee acquired no right to make general use of the property. The distinction between the two kinds of deposits is clearly pointed out in Anderson v. Pacific Bank, 112 Cal. 601, 44 Pac. 1063, 32 L. R. A. 479, 53 Am. St. Rep. 228, and People v. California, etc., Trust Co., 23 Cal. App. 199, 137 Pac. 1111, 1115.

Appellant also claims that the trial court erred in allowing interest from October 31, 1917, instead of January 25, 1918, when the demand was made for the payment of the residue. No doubt the general rule as to interest on deposits is correctly stated in Anderson v. Pacific Bank, supra, and Barrere v. Somps, 113 Cal. 97, 45 Pac. 177, 572, wherein it is held that interest is allowable from the date of demand. Herein, however, the court found on sufficient evidence that there was an actual conversion of the money on said October 31; and section 3336 of the Civil Code permits the recovery of the interest from that time. Moreover, we are not furnished with a copy of the pleadings upon which the action was tried, and we must assume that no issue was tendered as to this point. Indeed, we might go further in the assumption that it was admitted in the answer that a demand was made on said October 31. It may be added that the reduction of the amount recovered would be inconsiderable if effect were to be given to appellant's contention in this respect.

The judgment is affirmed.

Fraudulent conveyances — § 308(9) — Whether possession of chattels changed to satisfy statute a jury question.

Whether there had been such change of possession of automobile, alleged to have been sold by a husband to plaintiff, suing for conversion the sheriff who seized the car as the husband's, under attachment process issued at the instance of the wife, as satisfied Civ. Code, § 3440, held for the jury under the evidence that the husband was living with plaintiff, and that both he and she used the car after the claimed sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Myrtle Tennant against John C. Cline and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newmire & Watkins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph Musgrove, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Appellant brought this action to recover for the alleged conversion of an automobile which is claimed to have been improperly seized under attachment process by defendant Cline, as sheriff.

Lucy C. Gentry, in a divorce action against Harry V. Gentry, obtained judgment in April, 1916, for a monthly allowance for the support of herself and minor children and for an additional sum of $2,000, which represented her interest in the community property. The judgment remaining unsatisfied in February, 1919, Lucy C. Gentry caused the sheriff to levy on the automobile of which the plaintiff here later claimed to be the owner. From the statement of the testimony, as it is set forth in the bill of exceptions, it appears that the plaintiff had been named as the correspondent in the divorce action brought by Lucy C. Gentry against her husband, and that for a long period of time, up to the date when the automobile was taken under the writ, Gentry and this plaintiff lived in a four-room flat, and that no other person resided therein; that the automobile in question was used by both of them. The plaintiff testified that she was the owner of the automobile, having purchased it from Gentry in April, 1917, paying him $150 for his interest in the machine; that after she received the bill of sale Gentry continued to use the car with her permission, and that both of them drove it; and that Gentry had the same use of the car after the bill of sale was made as he had before, with the permission of the plaintiff. The testimony of the plaintiff and of other witnesses further showed that in all dealings with respect to the purchase of the car and the payment of the installments on account thereof, and the making of a loan which was obtained when a chattel mortgage (executed by Gentry) was given upon the security of the machine, Gentry acted alone, excepting that one bill for repairs amounting to a considerable sum was paid personally by the plaintiff. There was testimony of the daughter of the Gentrys as to a statement (made subsequent to the alleged making of the bill of sale) by plaintiff wherein the plaintiff affirmed that the automobile belonged to Gentry. The deputy sheriff who served the writ at the time the car was taken possession of by the sheriff testified that he went to the flat occupied by plaintiff and Gentry, and that Gentry went with him to the garage in the rear of the flats and backed the automobile out of the garage to the street and turned it over, saying: "You won't keep that car long, because it belongs to my father."

Defendants, in their answer, alleged that the pretended sale of the automobile by Gentry to the plaintiff was fraudulently made without consideration and with intent to prevent Mrs. Gentry from reaching the property or writ of execution under a judgment. The case as presented to the jury, however, seems to have left to be resolved, not the question whether actual fraud was intended to be committed in the regard mentioned, but whether, under section 3440, Civil Code, there had been such a change of possession and control of the automobile as between Gentry and this plaintiff as to transfer title as against Mrs. Gentry, who was a judgment debtor of the transferor. That section requires, in order that an effectual transfer of title of personal property may be had, that there be "an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred." The trial court instructed the jury generally as to the requirements of the law in the regard noted, and further gave this additional instruction:

"You are further instructed that if you find that H. V. Gentry, prior to the time of delivering to plaintiff, Myrtle Tennant, said bill of sale, dated the 5th day of April, 1917, had the use of said automobile, and that thereafter subsequent to the delivery of said bill of sale he still continued to have the use and control of said automobile in the same manner and to a like extent, that there is no such delivery as the law contemplates as requisite to constitute a valid transfer."

It is contended that the court erred in so instructing the jury, and it is argued that because of the relation and association between Gentry and the plaintiff, this instruction was not applicable and constituted prejudicial error. We are cited to the case of Morgan v. Ball, 81 Cal. 93, 22 Pac. 331, 5 L. R. A. 579, 15 Am. St. Rep. 34. In that case the parties between whom the transfer was alleged to have been made of a mare, colt, and buggy were husband and wife, and the court said that, notwithstanding the husband continued to have the use of the property, the wife could maintain her title. The court, however, stated in the opinion that it had been proclaimed by the husband that the property was that of the wife and had been publicly known and recognized as hers by all who used it, the court saying:

"She did not refuse her husband the use of it, but she did take it into possession at once and continuously keep and use it as hers as to all the world, and it was not in any way used or possessed by her husband, except as subordinate to her dominion, possession, and control."

That decision does, to some extent, bear the intimation, as appellant contends, that where the relationship of husband and wife exists possession by the husband of the property alleged to have been transferred will not preclude the wife from maintaining her title. However, the latter case of Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, 41 Am. St. Rep. 200, refers to Morgan v. Ball, supra, and contains the following declaration:

"The fact that a vendor and vendee are husband and wife, or parent and child, is no reason why the provisions of the statute should receive a different or more liberal construction. Those conditions give the statute no additional elasticity. The rule of construction is the same in all cases, and the relationship existing between the parties is a matter wholly immaterial."

And, moreover, in this case it appears that the parties were not related at all. They occupied the same four-room flat for reasons of their own, and, so far as the evidence shows, did not hold a partnership interest in the particular property alleged to have been converted. It was for the jury to determine from the facts, under the court's instructions, as to whether there had been such transfer and change of possession of the property as would sustain plaintiff in the cause of action asserted.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Estoppel ☞83(3)—Seller of lumber held estopped as against building mortgagee to set up he did not accept trust deed in place of lien.

Seller of lumber to contractor who represented to lender to contractor on mortgage that trust deed to him, the seller of lumber, would be inferior to the building loan mortgage, held estopped as to set up against the mortgagee that he did not accept the deed in payment for his lumber and in lieu of any lien therefor.

2. Estoppel ☞110—Building mortgagee not required to plead as against material man asserting lien.

Though the general rule is that an estoppel must be pleaded, there is an exception where the party is without knowledge that his claim must ultimately rest upon an estoppel, as in the case of a building mortgagee claiming against one who sold lumber to the contractor, and now claims a lien after representing to the mortgagee that he accepted trust deed in place thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by George P. Guy, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Pico Heights Lumber Company, against Harry R. Leech and others, and Sarah L.

Bond. From judgment decreeing plaintiff's mechanic's lien to be superior to her first mortgage, the last-named defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. L. Kilgore, Jas. W. Miller, and J. E. Carson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from that portion of a judgment which decrees that the mechanic's lien of plaintiff is superior to the first mortgage held by defendant and appellant upon certain real property in the county of Los Angeles. There were three actions involving the same issues, which were consolidated by the trial court and tried at the same time. In one of the actions the plaintiff Haslwanger sought to foreclose a mechanic's lien, and Sarah L. Bond, the appellant here, was made one of the defendants, as she held a first mortgage upon the property. This lien was decreed to be superior to the mortgage, and appellant does not object to this portion of the judgment, but states in her brief that the same has been paid.

In the second suit George P. Guy sought to enforce a mechanic's lien against the property and to have it declared superior to the mortgage. This was resisted by the mortgagee, Bond. Before a determination was had of the questions raised in these suits, the mortgage became due by reason of default in some of its terms, and the mortgagee, Bond, sought to foreclose the same in yet another suit, in which said lien claimants were joined as defendants. It was stipulated that the complaints in the mechanic's lien foreclosures should be considered the answers and cross-complaints of said claimants in the mortgage foreclosure suit of Sarah L. Bond. The actions were consolidated, and the one issue presented in them all was whether or not the mechanic's lien of the respondent was superior to the mortgage. The court found that it was, and from such determination the appellant prosecutes this appeal.

The facts with relation to this question are: Harry R. Leech was a builder, and he borrowed from Sarah L. Bond $3,000 for the purpose of building a house. For this amount he gave her his note, which was secured by a mortgage upon the house, then partially constructed. This mortgage was dated May 9 and recorded May 19, 1917. Leech had previously built houses, which were financed by building loans, and had purchased the lumber therefor from the respondent. In borrowing the money to carry on the work he had given first mortgages, and the respondent had furnished the lumber and had taken deeds of trust subject to the first mortgages upon the property upon which the work was being done. In this instance Leech and Guy—it is admitted by both of them—undertook to make the same arrangement, and Guy agreed to furnish the lumber and to take a deed of trust in payment therefor, subject to the first mortgage. He did furnish the lumber in accordance with this understanding, and it was used in the construction of the house. This construction work was well under way when Leech applied to Mrs. Bond's agent, Patterson, for the loan of $3,000. Mr. Patterson testified that he called up Mr. Guy on the telephone when Leech applied for the loan; that he told him that he considered the loan of $3,000 "pretty heavy, but Mr. Leech tells me that you are taking a trust deed for your lumber and material which would help the loan." Patterson then told Guy that one of his clients was already "mixed up" in some litigation over a loan, and he did not wish this to happen again, and he asked him expressly whether he was taking a trust deed for the lumber and material subject to the first mortgage, and Guy said "Yes." The respondent Guy, in his own testimony, states that he has heard the testimony of Mr. Patterson, and that Mr. Patterson correctly testified as to the conversations and transactions between them. After these representations Mrs. Bond made the loan on May 19, 1917. In June, 1917, Leech executed a trust deed to Guy for $747, the amount of the lumber bill. He executed his note for said amount and sent it to Guy directly, and sent the trust deed securing the note to be recorded. It was duly recorded on June 4, 1917, and, under the instructions from Leech, was sent by the recorder to Guy. Apparently, so far, everything was satisfactory to all parties, and the transactions were in accordance with the understanding of all persons concerned. It is because of subsequent events, occurring after this trust deed went into effect, that Guy seeks to escape the effect of his action in agreeing to accept the trust deed in payment.

Within a month Leech became involved in financial difficulties and did not complete the house. It appears from the record that the plumbing and a portion of the painting, and other minor matters, were left uncompleted, and that it would cost about $200 to finish the house. Leech ceased work upon the house, and the cement contractor, Halswanger, who had not been paid, filed his notice of lien for $230, which lien was adjudged in these consolidated actions to be superior to the mortgage, and is not disputed by the appellant.

In October, 1917, Leech being in default in the payment of interest upon the first mortgage, Mr. Patterson, the representative of the mortgagee, telephoned to Guy, who had the trust deed, and Guy said that he would pay the interest as soon as he could get a deed from Mr. Leech conveying the property to him. He later paid the interest and said he had received a deed from Leech. Guy had called upon Leech in October and had asked what was to be done about completing the house, and Leech had told him that he was trying very hard to dispose of the house, and Guy had suggested that Leech deed the property to him to avoid the expense and trouble of a foreclosure of his deed of trust. Leech asked for more time, which was granted, and later, upon another request from Guy, he executed a quitclaim deed to Guy.

In November, 1917, Guy filed his notice of lien and returned to Leech the trust deed and note and the quitclaim deed. He made no reconveyance of the property, but merely returned to Leech the evidences of the transfer of interest to himself. So far as the record shows, the trust deed is still on record unreleased and affects the title to this property. Guy now seeks to enforce his mechanic's lien. He takes the position that he accepted the trust deed in payment for his lumber upon the understanding that it was to be subject only to the first mortgage, and upon the understanding that the house would be completed by Leech, and that, as an intervening lien has accrued and the house is not completed, he does not wish to rely on his trust deed, but wishes to enforce his mechanic's lien. His explanation of his return of the quitclaim deed to the property, given to him in October by Guy, is that it was not a grant deed and was not signed by the wife of Leech, and that therefore it was not a deed satisfactory to him, and he had consequently returned the instrument to Leech.

We may eliminate the question of the sufficiency of the second deed and of Guy's acceptance thereof; for it appears to us that the facts regarding the trust deed are decisive of this case. Respondent agreed, as appears by his own testimony, to accept the trust deed in payment of his debt, which trust deed was to be inferior to the building money mortgage given to Mrs. Bond. He represented to Mrs. Bond that this would be done after he had been told that she would consider the loan a heavy one unless he agreed to do this; in other words, he, by his representations, caused her to believe in the security of the loan and to advance the money. The advancement of this money by her for the building was an advantage to him, as he was selling the lumber, and had sold lumber under such conditions to Leech for several other houses. He acted in accordance with his representations and took the trust deed. His later disappointment in regard to the action of Leech in not paying the cement bill and in not completing the house cannot affect the rights of Mrs. Bond. This is a matter between Guy and Leech. The arguments of respondent that Leech has not fulfilled his part of the contract, and therefore Guy is not bound thereby, would be pertinent if the contest was between Guy and Leech. The value of Mrs. Bond's security is impaired because Leech has not completed the building, and, for the same reason, the value of Guy's security is impaired. Leech has not fulfilled his duty toward either of them. Each took this chance with reference to Leech. There appears to be no reason why Guy should shift his share of this burden upon the shoulders of Mrs. Bond in addition to her own share of the burden.

The question of law involved here is carefully discussed, both upon principle and authority, in the cases cited to us by the appellant, most of which are reviewed by our own Supreme Court in the case of Martin v. Becker, 169 Cal. 301, at page 309 et seq., 146 Pac. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171. It is said in the case of Martin v. Becker, supra, in enumerating the different classes of cases in which the taking of new or additional security operates to destroy an existing lien, that, where it would be fraud upon other claimants to permit the earlier lien to be held valid, equity interposes and declares it to have been waived or lost by the taking of the later security, or, what is in effect the same, erects a bar to its enforcement.

[1, 2] The respondent is estopped to set up as against this appellant that he did not accept the trust deed in payment for his material and in lieu of any lien which the law allowed to him therefor. Respondent seeks to avoid the force of the facts constituting the estoppel by reason of the fact that the estoppel was not pleaded. While it is true that the general rule requires an estoppel to be pleaded, yet it has been held that there is an exception to this rule where the party is without knowledge that his claim must ultimately rest upon an estoppel. Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559. In the present case the appellant did not rely upon an estoppel as the foundation of her claim. She believed and alleged that Guy had accepted the trust deed in payment of his debt. The evidence upon the trial disclosed the fact that Guy was denying his acceptance of this trust deed. In rebutting this contention, facts were introduced in evidence which would constitute an estoppel. Under such circumstances appellant was entitled to take advantage of these facts, although they had not been pleaded. It is said in Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252, that an estoppel in pais may be shown by way of equitable rebuttal, and that it is only when the plaintiff must rely upon an estoppel in pais in order to maintain his action at all against the defendant that it must be pleaded. In the present case it is admitted that Guy agreed to take the trust deed in payment; the trust deed to him was put upon record; he had told Mrs. Bond's agent that he would accept it subject to the first mortgage, and she alleged that he had so accepted it in payment. It was only when he sought to evade these facts that the estoppel needed to be invoked as an equitable rebuttal.

[3] There are, however, no findings upon which we could order a judgment to be entered decreeing the priority of appellant's mortgage lien. We have no power to make findings for the trial court. Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., supra. Therefore the judgment, in so far as it relates to the lien of the respondent Guy, and in so far as it decrees that lien to be superior to the mortgage of the appellant, is reversed.

GEORGE et al. v. STENSLAND et al.
(Civ. 3378.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 21, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 19, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 1170(1)—Lack of service on husband of defendant wife harmless to wife.

Where a wife, sued for legal services in connection with her separate estate and transactions before marriage, was aided in her defense at every step by her husband, a practicing attorney, the fact that he was not served though named in the complaint as a defendant as John Doe was harmless to the wife, and no ground for reversal of judgment against her alone, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

2. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 1073(3) — Defendant called indifferently by two names may not complain of judgment in one of such names.

Defendant wife, called indifferently by the name of Clarke or Stensland, who adopted the latter name in her notice of appeal, the two persons being completely identified in the record as herself, cannot complain that judgment was entered against her in the name of Clarke-Stensland.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by Jesse George and Charles B. McCoy, copartners, against Elizabeth G. Clarke Stensland, sued as Elizabeth G. Clarke, and John Doe. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant Stensland appeals. Affirmed.

Theodore Stensland and J. T. Reed, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Jesse George and Charles B. McCoy, both of San Diego, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, from a judgment entered on a verdict of a jury for $514, in the superior court of San Diego county, in an action for the recovery of the reasonable value of attorneys' fees for professional services rendered by the plaintiffs to the appellant.

This appeal was originally taken not only from the judgment, but also from an order denying a new trial, and from an order of nonsuit on a cross-complaint, and from an order made in proceedings supplementary to judgment and execution. It is stated, however, by the appellant in her opening brief, that she "waives and abandons any and all her rights to appeal from said order denying a new trial, and from said order in supplementary proceedings," and prosecutes her appeal exclusive thereof.

The principal point argued by the appellant, and the one she states to be the important feature of the case, is that the judgment was erroneously entered by reason of the fact that said judgment was entered against a married woman in a cause in which she was sued as the wife of another party defendant, named in the complaint as "John Doe," and said husband of appellant was not served with summons in the action.

The facts pertinent to a discussion of the objection present some unusual features, and it will be necessary to state them rather fully. The plaintiffs sued, as aforesaid, to recover for legal services. The defendants named in the complaint are Elizabeth G. Clarke and John Doe. It is set out in the complaint that the services for which recovery is sought were contracted for by the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, "being then and there an unmarried woman, and in the management of her own affairs." It is further set out in the complaint as follows:

"Plaintiffs further allege that they are informed and believe, and on such information and belief allege, that since this cause of action accrued, the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, has married one John Doe, whose true name is unknown to these plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs have not sufficient information to determine whether or not, if defendant is married, her husband is a necessary party defendant, and plaintiffs pray that if it shall appear that the said defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, is married and that her husband is a necessary party, he may be joined and his true name as defendant herein inserted, and that the true name of the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, be inserted herein in the event that she is shown to be married."

Answer and cross-complaint was filed by Elizabeth G. Clarke, in which she did not deny the allegation of the complaint upon information and belief, with reference to her marriage. She made no mention of this allegation in any way, and answered under the name of Elizabeth G. Clarke. Appellant's position is that, as the allegations of the complaint regarding defendant's coverture were admitted by a failure to deny the same, it became the duty of the plaintiffs to ascertain, by deposition or otherwise, the name of her husband, and to substitute such name for the fictitious name and serve him with summons.

The plaintiffs did, however, attempt to ascertain the facts regarding defendant's marriage by their demurrer to the answer and cross-complaint, in which demurrer one of the grounds urged is:

"The said answer to plaintiffs' first cause of action is uncertain in that the said answer admits that the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, is married, by failing to deny the allegation of the complaint that she is married, but does not give her true name nor the true name of her husband, nor allege or set forth facts from which it can be determined whether or not her husband is a proper or necessary party defendant."

Another ground of demurrer to the answer and cross-complaint is that cross-complainant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, has not legal capacity to sue in that she admits in her answer and cross-complaint that she is married, and that the cross-complaint does not show that the action is one within any of the exceptions mentioned in section 370, Code of Civil Procedure. This demurrer was overruled, obviously because the property sought to be recovered under the cross-complaint was alleged to have been the sole and separate property of Elizabeth G. Clarke, and for the recovery of such property she had the right to sue alone. The attorney filing the cross-complaint was Theodore Stensland, and he appears throughout as attorney of record for the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke. In the answer to the cross-complaint, plaintiffs allege:

"Plaintiffs and cross-defendants are informed and advised and therefore allege the fact to be that at the time when the defendant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, claims to have become the owner of the draft mentioned and described in the first paragraph of her cross-complaint, and for some time prior thereto, the said defendant and cross-complainant was the wife of Theodore Stensland, her attorney herein; that the exact date of the marriage of the said Elizabeth G. Clarke and Theodore Stensland is unknown to these plaintiffs and cross-defendants; that Elizabeth G. Clarke is not the true and proper name of the defendant and cross-complainant, and John Doe is not the true name of the husband of the said defendant and cross-complainant, Elizabeth G. Clarke, but that the true name of said Elizabeth G. Clarke is Elizabeth G. Stensland, and the true name of the husband of the said Elizabeth G. Clarke is Theodore Stensland, who was and is her attorney herein, and that there are no facts set forth in said cross-complaint establishing or tending to establish that Theodore Stensland is not a necessary party cross-complainant and defendant as hereinafter more specifically set forth and shown."

After the granting of motions to strike out portions of the answer to the cross-complaint, relating to the necessity of joining appellant's husband as a cross-complainant, the cause went to trial upon these pleadings. Plaintiffs never amended their complaint by inserting the true name of the husband of Elizabeth G. Clarke. It does not appear in the record that the husband was or was not served under the fictitious name or otherwise. It would seem, therefore, that in support of the judgment we must assume that the service was duly made. However, even in the absence of this assumption, and assuming for the moment that the record must affirmatively show that the husband was served, we do not believe this error calls for a reversal of the judgment under the peculiar facts presented for our consideration.

Defendant, Elizabeth G. Stensland, did not object to the defect of parties by either demurrer or answer, nor otherwise, and upon the verdict of the jury upon the essential questions of fact involved the court rendered judgment against her alone.

Reliance is placed by the appellants upon the cases of McDonald v. Porsh, 136 Cal. 301, 68 Pac. 817, and Fassio v. Woolfrey, 37 Cal. App. 754, 174 Pac. 700, holding that, the husband, being a necessary party defendant in cases where the wife is sued, he must not only be named in the complaint, but served with summons. Respondent's reply to this contention is that under the holding in the case of Bogart v. Woodruff, 96 Cal. 609, 31 Pac. 618, it is said that, although the husband is a necessary party defendant and the failure of plaintiff to make him a defendant would defeat his right of recovery if objection be properly presented, yet it is further provided by section 434, Code of Civil Procedure, that if no objection be taken to the defect of parties, either by demurrer or answer, the defendant must be deemed to have waived the same.

We are not unmindful of appellant's position that she could not properly demur for nonjoinder of parties since her husband was joined in the complaint as John Doe; that she had a right to expect that he would be served with summons in due time. However, she did not object to the entry of the judgment upon this ground, and her situation with reference to the demurrer would be of more weight and importance under other circumstances than those presented to us here. For the peculiar facts of this case certainly show that the defendant was not deprived of any possible right or advantage by reason of this oversight, that the purpose of the Code provision in question has not been subverted by plaintiffs' inadvertence, and that the case presents, clearly, a situation designed to be covered by section 4½, art. 6, of our Constitution. The husband of appellant is admitted to be a practicing attorney, and to have represented his wife in every stage of the litigation herein involved; he had actual notice of everything that occurred; he is not bound by the judgment and could not have been. The judgment relates to a matter connected with the wife's separate estate, and to transactions occurring previous to the marriage. It is said in McDonald v. Porsh, supra, and in the case of Terry v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 85, 88, 42 Pac. 464, and some others, that the Code provision for joining the husband in such actions is not to the end that the husband or his property may be bound by the judgment, but solely that he may be able to aid his wife in her defense.

[1] Under the peculiar facts of this case, this purpose was fully accomplished, for the husband aided and conducted her defense at every step.

It would seem, therefore, that this is essentially one of those harmless errors which does not affect the merits of the judgment, and which comes within the remedial influence of the aforementioned amendment to our Constitution. It is held in Work v. Campbell, 164 Cal. 343, 349, 128 Pac. 943, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 581, in Lamb v. Harbaugh, 105 Cal. 680, 690, 39 Pac. 56, and in Baldwin v. Second Street, etc., Co., 77 Cal. 390, 19 Pac. 644, that a defect of parties is not a matter going to the jurisdiction of the court; and indeed that holding necessarily follows from the holding in many cases that it is a defect which may be waived by failure to demur.

[2] Some objection is made by appellant that the judgment is entered against her as Elizabeth G. Clarke Stensland. In her testimony on the trial, she stated that her name at that time was Elizabeth G. Clarke Stensland, but that she might be called by either the name of Clarke or Stensland. It is to be noted that she answered under the name of Clarke, and only upon her examination at the trial did she admit that her proper name was then Stensland. She has adopted the name of Stensland in her notice of appeal. The two persons are completely identified in the record. It would appear, therefore, that appellant has no complaint that judgment was entered against her in the name which she admits is at present her proper name. Thompson v. Alford, 135 Cal. 52, 66 Pac. 983; Alameda County v. Crocker et al., 125 Cal. 101, 57 Pac. 766; Bogart v. Woodruff, supra.

Some further objections are made by appellant with regard to the giving of instructions by the court, but we consider these to be without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUTCHISON v. HOLLAND et al.
(Civ. 2980.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 24, 1920. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1920.)

1. Principal and agent §145(2) — Recovery against undisclosed principal may be had only on nonnegotiable notes.

Where a negotiable note is executed unqualifiedly, recovery thereon cannot be had against an undisclosed principal, but such recovery may be had where the note is not negotiable.

2. Principal and agent §23(5)—Evidence held not to show undisclosed principal.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain a finding that one of defendants was the undisclosed principal of another who made notes secured by mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by C. S. Hutchison against John P. Holland and others. Judgment against the named defendant, and he appeals. Reversed.

J. R. Whittemore, of Los Angeles (F. L. Anderson, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Ben F. Gray and Geo. S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant Holland appeals from a judgment entered against him. The action was brought to recover a balance due on two promissory notes. The notes were executed by defendant Marie C. Heath, and certain real property was made security for the payment thereof, against which a trust deed was executed. Appellant did not join in the making of the promissory notes or the deed; in fact, his name did not appear in the instruments referred to at all. The notes, as before mentioned, were two in number. One was made payable to Elizabeth E. Curtis, and the second to Helen C. Brennan. The two last-named persons indorsed the same, and they were transferred to Nina A. Hutchison, who paid therefor $1,750. At the time the trust deed and notes were executed there was a first mortgage lien against the property, amounting to $3,000; hence the trust deed became second in order of security. Default was made in the payment of the notes, and upon sale of the property under the trust deed being had, a small part only of the principal debt evidenced by the notes was realized. Nina A. Hutchison transferred her interest to the plaintiff here, and this suit was brought to collect the deficiency. It was alleged in the complaint, and the court found the facts accordingly, that Holland was the undisclosed principal of Marie C. Heath. While rendering judgment against Holland, the court found in favor of Marie C. Heath, and determined that she was not liable for any part of the money claimed.

[1] It is the contention of appellant that, where a promissory note is executed unqualifiedly, it cannot be asserted that there exists any undisclosed principal against whom recovery may be had. Respondent has cited ample authority to show that appellant is correct only in his statement of the law where the notes considered are negotiable; that, where the notes are not negotiable, an undisclosed principal may be held.

[2] Admitting that the notes here exhibited are of the character which permits recovery against an undisclosed principal, it is the contention of appellant that under the evidence the court was not justified in finding that Holland held any relation of principal such as to make him liable to the plaintiff therefor. As the evidence discloses, Holland presented the trust deed and notes to the plaintiff, who was Nina A. Hutchison's agent, and recommended their purchase as a good investment; he stated to plaintiff that Marie C. Heath was the owner of the property; he also informed plaintiff of the existence of the $3,000 first mortgage lien; plaintiff and Nina A. Hutchison visited the property for the purpose of investigating the character of the security offered; after examining the property plaintiff closed the deal on behalf of his principal and paid to Holland $1,750, and received the promissory notes of Marie C. Heath, which were indorsed with the names of the payees. Throughout the transaction up to this point it was not claimed by the plaintiff or his principal that Holland pretended to have any interest in the property or the notes. Plaintiff further testified that, when interest installments became due and were unpaid, he demanded payment of Marie C. Heath, and she referred him to Holland, and Holland in turn referred him back to Marie C. Heath, stating that she would take care of it. Holland testified that he had no interest in the transaction other than that he received a commission. He stated that it was a fact that Marie C. Heath held the title to the property only for Curtis and Brennan, who were "Eastern" ladies, and that he (Holland) was the agent of Curtis and Brennan; that upon sale of the promissory notes secured by the trust deed to Nina A. Hutchison he (Holland) had, after deducting his commission, remitted the remainder of the money to Curtis and Brennan. The testimony of Holland stands uncontradicted. It may have been that the court disbelieved his statements, but, as the record discloses them, the statements of Holland do not bear the imprint of inherent improbability.

bility; hence we must conclude that they amounted to substantial evidence, and that the court was not authorized to disregard them. Accepting Holland's testimony at its face value, it did not establish that he occupied the position of an undisclosed principal toward Nina A. Hutchison, or this plaintiff. That Marie C. Heath is liable upon the note obligation there can be no possible question. She made the notes, executed the trust deed, was in fact the record owner of the real property concerned, and was accepted by the Hutchisons in that relation. We are at a loss to understand why the court by its judgment relieved the maker of the notes from the duty to respond to the claim of the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed.

CONRAD v. LA PLANTE. (Civ. 3377.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 22, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's findings on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Where the trial court had the witnesses before it and the evidence is clearly conflicting, its findings of fact are conclusive.

2. Bills and notes ⇨516—Evidence in action on notes held to sustain finding for plaintiff.

In action on promissory notes for money loaned, evidence held such that if the appellate court could substitute its conclusion for that of the trial court as to which witnesses were worth believing, it must sustain trial court's views in favor of plaintiff.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(1)—Error in findings held harmless.

In action for money lent, a finding that the loan was not made at an earlier date, if erroneous, was harmless to the defendant, and would not support reversal; there being no plea of statute of limitations.

Action by Kokoa B. Conrad against William Parsons, in which William La Plante, as defendant's executor, was subsequently substituted. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Dana Ong, Paul W. Schenck, and Richard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him and in favor of plaintiff for $2,750 upon a complaint containing four causes of action, the first three of which were upon promissory notes and the fourth for money loaned in the amount of $1,500. The attack upon the judgment is confined to that portion of it which relates to the fourth cause of action.

The facts material to the opinion are: In November, 1915, plaintiff delivered to defendant $3,000 and received from him shares of stock in the National Film Corporation of the par value of $2,000. As a part of the transaction it was agreed that the plaintiff should be employed as an actress or performer by the National Film Corporation at a salary of $40 per week. After plaintiff's money had been obtained by the defendant she was employed for a period of two weeks, and paid the stipulated salary. Thereupon the corporation ceased to do business, and permitted its charter to lapse through its failure to pay the state license tax. In February, 1916, plaintiff called upon defendant and made a demand for the return of her money, and thereupon defendant gave her $250 in cash, the three notes which are the basis of the first three causes of action herein, amounting to $1,250, and, as the plaintiff alleged and testified, promised to give her $1,500 more. The evidence relating to the transactions in November and February is conflicting. On behalf of plaintiff it is shown that the original transaction was a loan of $2,000, evidenced by a promissory note and secured by certificates of stock of the National Film Corporation of the par value of $2,000. The second installment of $1,000 it is claimed was also loaned to defendant by plaintiff, for which she received neither note nor security. On behalf of defendant it is claimed that the original transaction was a sale of 3,000 shares of the National Film Corporation at par for the sum of $3,000, which, admittedly, were of no value whatever. Defendant was president of this company.

The weakness of defendant's position in this respect is found in his own testimony to the effect that the company was at that time "broke, and everybody knew it," and that the stock was worthless; also in the testimony of one Miller, an agent of defendant, that "our company was practically broke, and we didn't know whether we were going to get another dollar in or not; and I was broke, and everybody else was broke; so it was a very uncertain proposition." Then the witness Hale, an employé of Parsons at the time of the original transaction, testified regarding the conversations had in his presence between defendant and Miller, as follows:

"Mr. Miller said we had a sucker, in plain English, talking of a woman who got money, and going to put in so much money, lend so much money, but you have to use her. I says, 'Has she ever done acting?' I was told no. I says, 'Good night'—that is my favorite expression. Then I was explained to use this woman's money, we can't make any— Q. Who stated this? A. Mr. Parsons. Q. Did he say who the woman was? A. Miss Kokoa, Princess Kokoa—Kokoa Baldwin. Q. Was there anything more stated there with reference to the— A. She was to put $3,000 in—she was to loan $3,000 to the company, for which she was to receive some National stock security. She was to receive stock for security and this $3,000, or whatever the sum was—I can't swear to that, judge—that sum, but it was in the thousands—we were to make two pictures and get some money— Q. Who said that? A. Mr. Parsons. Q. At the time when Mr. Miller was present? A. Well, Mr. Miller was in and out of the studio; I can't exactly say that he was out. Mr. Miller was present on one occasion when discussing this money matter; he was to get his share out of it, $500, for getting the money, and I got $150 out of it, two weeks' work.

"The Court: Who said Mr. Miller was to get $500 out of it? A. Parsons told me that this money Mr. Miller was to procure and from this money he gets a commission of $500, which only would leave us $2,500 to make the pictures. * * * Q. Have you stated all that was said about lending the money? A. Well, lending the money—I don't know who it was made to directly, but Mr. Parsons was to give security of National stock for the loan of the money. I remember he said that, laughing, he says, 'I gave her some security, National Film Corporation stock.'"

[1, 2] In addition to this it is admitted that defendant, who was practically the sole owner of the stock of the corporation, had failed to pay the state license tax, so that the corporation forfeited its right to do business at about the time this transaction was had. On this evidence the trial court was required to determine whether he should believe the evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff or the confessions of fraud and swindling offered to support the position of the defendant. Conflict in the evidence is clear, and even if this court could substitute its conclusion for that of the trial court, it would not be disposed to do so, in view of the character of the evidence offered by defendant.

The evidence relating to the transaction occurring on February 15, 1916, is confined solely to the conflicting testimony of plaintiff and defendant; they being the only persons present at any time while the transactions were had. The plaintiff testified that she returned to defendant his promissory note and the stock which she asserted had been delivered to her as security, and that in return therefor defendant paid her $250 in cash, gave her three notes amounting to $1,250, and promised to pay her $1,500 more at a future date. Defendant testified that plaintiff appealed to him in a destitute condition, requesting him to buy back the stock which he claimed to have sold to her in the preceding November, and he gave her $250 therefor, though he knew at the time that the stock was worthless; that the three notes were given with the understanding that they would be payable only in the event that defendant was able to sell one of the pictures in which plaintiff had participated, and that no promise of any nature was given regarding the payment of $1,500 nor any other sum than that evidenced by the three notes.

It is argued that plaintiff's story is incredible because, having taken written promises to pay $1,250, it is highly improbable that she would have accepted a verbal promise to pay $1,500 with no written evidence thereof. But defendant's story regarding this transaction is just as incredible. The trial court had both witnesses before it, it had rejected defendant's testimony regarding the transaction of November, 1915, and was in a position to determine whether plaintiff's story of the February transaction should be believed. The finding of the court upon this issue cannot be disturbed.

[3] It is argued by appellant that the evidence does not support the finding that the sum of $1,500 was loaned on or about the 15th day of February, 1916, as alleged in the fourth cause of action. In this connection it is said that, accepting plaintiff's story of the entire transaction, this loan was made in November, 1915, and not at the time alleged in the complaint. The judgment carries interest from the 15th day of February, 1916, and defendant is not harmed by the finding that the loan was not in fact made at an earlier date. This is especially true in a case where, as here, the plea of the statute of limitations is not made. Thus, if the finding was erroneous, it was harmless error which would not support a reversal.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

(190 P.)

RUMETSCH v. DAVIE et al. (Civ. 3226.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 17, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇨187—Police pension computed on basis of salary at time of disability.

Under Charter of Oakland, § 91, amended to give police corporal $1,620 a year instead of $1,500 a year as formerly, and section 95, authorizing a pension on disability computed on basis of one-half the salary attached to rank held one year prior to retirement, a corporal retired less than one year after amendment is entitled to pension based on $1,620.

2. Statutes ⇨190—Construed to avoid ambiguities.

It is the duty of the courts to interpret statutes in such manner that they may be free from ambiguity and not to be ingenious to find ambiguities in them because of extraneous matters.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Herman O. Rumetsch against John L. Davie and others, as members of Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund of the City of Oakland. From a judgment granting writ, respondents appeal. Affirmed.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., and Leon E. Gray, Deputy City Atty., both of Oakland, for appellants.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

BRITTAI, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment awarding the plaintiff a peremptory writ of mandate in effect directing them to approve his claim as a retired corporal of police in the city of Oakland for one-half the amount of salary attached to the rank he had held for one year prior to his retirement. The facts are admitted, and the only question to be determined is whether the respondent is entitled to pension computed on a basis of the salary he was receiving at the date of retirement or that which he was receiving one year prior to retirement.

The charter of the city of Oakland was adopted in 1911. By section 91 it was provided that—"The officers and members of the police department shall receive as annual compensations: * * * Corporals—$1,500.00. * * * Said compensations shall be paid in equal monthly installments. No compensation higher than those herein specified shall be paid to any officer. * * *

Section 95 was as follows:

"Any member of the department who shall become physically disabled by reason of any bodily injury received in the performance of his duty, upon his filing with the board of trustees a verified petition, setting forth the facts constituting such disability, and the cause thereof, accompanied by a certificate signed by the chief of police, the captain of the division to which he belongs, and by two regularly licensed physicians of the city, recommending his retirement upon a pension, on account of such disability, may be retired from the department upon an annual pension, equal to one-half the amount of salary attached to the rank which he held one year prior to the date of such retirement, to be paid to him during his life, and to cease at his death. In case his disability shall cease, his pension shall cease, and he shall be restored to the service in the rank he occupied at the time of his retirement."

Under these provisions, when an officer who had held the rank of corporal for one year prior to his retirement was retired, he was paid one-half the amount of salary attached to the rank at the date of his retirement. Since that was the salary attached to the rank one year prior to the retirement, it was also equal to one-half the salary attached to the rank at that time. The language of the section was in no sense ambiguous or uncertain.

In 1919 the people of Oakland amended section 91 of the charter, and it became effective on the approval of the Legislature on January 17, 1919. As amended, it provided that—

"The officers and members of the police department shall receive annual compensations comprising their salaries of not less than: * * * Corporals—$1,620.00. * * * Said compensations shall be paid in equal monthly installments. * * *

"No other or further deduction shall be made from the pay of any officer or member of the department for any fund or purpose unless the same is authorized by this charter.

"No compensation or salary less than those herein specified shall be paid to any officer or member of the police department. * * *

The respondent held the rank of corporal on April 1, 1918, and on April 1, 1919, the appellants, constituting the board of trustees adopted a resolution by which he was retired on account of physical disability received in the performance of his duty as corporal. Under the terms of the charter his salary is payable to him quarterly. The first payment on July, 1919, was made on the basis of a salary of $1,500. He presented a claim for the second quarter on the basis of salary at $1,620, plus the ratable shortage on the first payment. The appellants refused to allow the claim on the sole ground that the petitioner was entitled only to the salary attached to the rank of corporal one year prior to the date of retirement.

Under section 95, if the disability is removed, the pension will cease, and the respondent will be restored to the service in the rank he occupied at the date of his retirement. If he should be so restored, under the provisions of section 91, as amended, he will immediately be entitled to salary at the rate of $1,620 a year. While he is on the retired list, it would seem to be entirely consistent with the language, as well as the purpose, of section 95, that he should receive as pension one-half the amount he would receive as a corporal if on active service. This court has no hesitation in determining that the amount of the pension is fixed by the salary attached to the rank of the retired man at the time of retirement, provided he held that rank for the period of one year prior to the date of retirement. If, in amending section 91, the people of Oakland had intended to change the plain and unambiguous meaning of section 95, without doubt they would have in terms amended the section. The amendment of section 91 did not serve to import an ambiguity into section 95, which had theretofore been free from uncertainty. It is the duty of the courts to interpret statutes in such a manner that they may be free from ambiguity, and not to be ingenious to find ambiguities in them because of extraneous matters, nor is it their duty to assume the function of the law-making power. Section 95 cannot be given the construction contended for by the appellants without amending it by interpolating a clause limiting its effect and changing its clear meaning. The conclusion reached coincides with the rule adopted in the city and county of San Francisco upon a similar provision of its charter. (Opinions City Attorney, Percy V. Long, January 20, 1908.)

The judgment is affirmed.

SUGAR LOAF ORANGE GROWERS' ASS'N
v. SKEWES. (Civ. 2825.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1920.)

1. Evidence §354(13)—Ledger account made up from memoranda admissible to prove items of charge.

In an action for an indebtedness due on book account as balance on picking, hauling, washing, packing, and shipping defendant's oranges, ledger account, contained in book kept by plaintiff showing its account with defendant, held admissible to prove items constituting charges for picking, hauling, washing, and packing, ledger having been made up from memoranda received by plaintiff in his regular course of business so that entry might be regarded as original.

2. Limitation of actions §54(2)—"Mutual, open, and current account" defined.

As respects the application of Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2, a "mutual, open, and current" account is an unsettled debt arising from items of work and labor, goods sold and delivered, and other open transactions, not reduced to writing, and subject to future settlement and adjustment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by the Sugar Loaf Orange Growers' Association against H. G. Skewes. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Benjamin Lewis, Mab. Copland Linneman, and H. N. Linneman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. As stated in the complaint, the cause of action sued on herein is an alleged indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff "upon a mutual, open, and current book account, said sum of $532.07 being the balance due and owing to plaintiff for the picking, hauling, washing, packing, and shipping of defendant's oranges during the season of 1912, together with certain moneys advanced by the plaintiff therefor at defendant's request, after deducting therefrom and crediting to the defendant all moneys received by the plaintiff for the defendant from the sale of defendant's oranges." The principal contention of appellant is that the court erred in overruling his objection to the introduction in evidence of a ledger account contained in a book kept by the plaintiff and showing its account with defendant. It is claimed that no sufficient foundation was laid for the admission in evidence of said ledger account. To the extent of $508 the account shows the items charged for picking, hauling, washing, and packing the oranges taken from defendant's orchard, together with a selling charge of 10 cents per box for the 750 packed boxes as shipped. The remaining items consist of an "account sales," showing the receipts from the sales and the charges for freight and refrigeration and for auction commission. The net result of the "account sales" was a balance of $24.07 debited against the defendant, thus making the total balance of $532.07, constituting plaintiff's claim. The witness E. F. Wolever was secretary and general manager of the plaintiff. Plaintiff's method of doing business was described by this witness. Plaintiff is a growers' organization which handles the growers' crops on an estimated cost basis. The Mutual Orange Distributors is a corporation having its central office at Redlands, Cal., which acts as the selling agent for a group of orange growers' associations; the plaintiff being one of those associations. In the instant case, the plaintiff agreed to pick, haul, and pack defendant's oranges and cause the same to be shipped and sold through the agency of the Mutual Orange Distributors. This was done, and the account sued upon is the result of that transaction.

It appears from the testimony of Wolever that he personally paid out all of the moneys constituting the items charged against the defendant, and that he was personally acquainted with the facts with respect to the picking, hauling, washing, and packing of the oranges and the payment of the 10 cents per box commission to the Mutual Orange Distributors. He did not count and observe every detail, but he saw the work going on in defendant's orchard, and saw the fruit received at the packing house. For actual time of the work of the men in the orchard and in hauling he relied upon information furnished to him by the plaintiff's foreman at the orchard, the receiving clerk at plaintiff's packing house, and upon statements of the pickers themselves, all of which was in the usual course of business of the plaintiff. The entries made by Wolever in the ledger account were the original and only book entries made by the plaintiff; that is to say, the ledger entries were not copies from any other book or memorandum of the plaintiff.

[1] From the foregoing evidence we are satisfied that the ledger was admissible in evidence to prove the items constituting the first-mentioned charge amounting to $508. As to the "account sales," a separate statement will be made herein. The rule of evidence applying to account books is stated in Chan Kiu Sing v. Gordon, 171 Cal. 28, 151 Pac. 657, as follows:

"In order to lay the foundation for the admission of such evidence it must be shown that the books in question are books of account kept in the regular course of the business; that the business is of a character in which it is proper or customary to keep such books; that the entries were either original entries or the first permanent entries of the transactions; that they were made at the time, or within reasonable proximity to the time of the respective transactions; and that the person making them had personal knowledge of the transactions or obtained such knowledge from a report regularly made to him by some other person employed in the business whose duty it was to make the same in the regular course of business. 1 Elliott on Evidence, §§ 458 to 463, inclusive; 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 1554; 2 Jones on Evidence, § 322."

Counsel for appellant concede that Mr. Wolever did have knowledge, either direct or indirect, of the transactions concerning the packing, etc., of the oranges, and lay the emphasis of their objection upon that part of the ledger constituting the "account sales." The witness Wolever testified that he represented the plaintiff as one of the subsidiary associations making up the Mutual Orange Distributors, and was a member of the board of directors of the Mutual Orange Distributors. As such director he was familiar with the system under which the fruit was shipped, sold, and accounted for through that agency. The Mutual Orange Distributors shipped to various representatives throughout the country the fruit received by it, and the sales were made through these representatives, who then reported to the Mutual Orange Distributors by rendering in each case an "account sales" in the form of duplicate carbon copies containing the several statements of account. One of these duplicates is kept by the Mutual Orange Distributors as its record of the transaction, and the other is sent to the fruit growers' organization. Thus, in the instant case there were three "account sales," one for each of the three cars in which the fruit was shipped. One came from Cleveland, one from New York, and one from Boston. All of the sales were made at auction. Of the duplicate copies so received by the Mutual Orange Distributors, one of each was delivered to the plaintiff. It was from those statements that the entries were made by Mr. Wolever in the ledger account introduced in evidence in this action. The witness Wolever testified that the accounts of sales thus furnished constituted all of the memoranda and data which under that method of doing business are used in making settlements. In connection with the cross-examination of Mr. Wolever, the defendant called for the said accounts of sales furnished to plaintiff by the Mutual Orange Distributors, and introduced them in evidence. They are in the record as Defendant's Exhibit R, and correspond in amounts to the entries contained in the ledger account. No evidence to contradict them was offered by the defendant. It appears to us that if there was any error in the reception of the ledger account in evidence as covering these items of the "account sales," such error is cured by the introduction in evidence of said Exhibit R at the instance of the defendant himself. Having been received by the plaintiff in the usual course of business, they constituted a reasonable basis of authority to the plaintiff to pay out the balance charged to it on the loss incurred by the sales, and to charge to the defendant the amount so paid out by the plaintiff for his account. Considered in this light, the ledger entry itself may be regarded as the original entry of the account of the plaintiff against the defendant.

[2] Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's finding that the account sued upon is true and correct, "and constitutes an open, current, mutual, and book account." We think that the evidence established the character of the account as a mutual, open, and current account; it being within the following definition:

"An unsettled debt arising from items of work and labor, goods sold and delivered, and other open transactions, not reduced to writing, and subject to future settlement and adjustment. It is usually disclosed by the account books of the owner of the demand. * * * Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 253, 146 Pac. 692; George Rice & Sons v. Cowan, 189 Pac. 132.

This being so, the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, since the action was commenced within the period of four years from the time when the cause of action accrued. Code Civ. Proc. § 337, subd. 2.

The judgment is affirmed.

GROVER et al. v. MORRISON. (Civ. 2162.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 18, 1920.)

1. Judgment — 251(1) — Contributory negligence put in issue by cross-complaint.

In action for damages from automobile collision, in which defendant filed cross-complaint for damages to his own automobile as due to plaintiffs' negligence, a verdict for neither party, based on plaintiffs' negligence as well as defendant's, held warranted by the pleadings, as against the objection that contributory negligence was not pleaded, as all the pleadings and the issues submitted by them were necessarily to be considered in their entirety.

2. Trial — 29(3) — Court's question whether witness was "guessing" at distance testified to not error.

In automobile collision case, where witness had testified the wreck was a certain distance from the end of a bridge, the court was not without legal right to ask the witness whether he was "guessing" at the distance; this being no more than inquiry whether his statement was based on measurement or estimate.

3. Trial — 29(2) — Trial judge's inadvertent statement as to evidence which had been given not error.

In automobile collision case, the trial judge's inadvertent statement, in ruling on the admission of testimony, that two witnesses had testified that plaintiffs' machine was moved after the accident, which statement, on plaintiffs' counsel's calling attention to its incorrectness, was in a measure corrected by a subsequent observation by the judge, held not valid ground for objection.

4. Witnesses — 358 — Cross-examination of impeaching witness as to drunkenness held proper.

Defendant's witness, having testified that plaintiffs' witness was drunk shortly before the automobile collision upon which the action was based, was properly asked by plaintiffs' counsel on cross-examination whether he was not drunk himself, and whether it was a fact that up to that time for months he did not draw a sober breath; it being proper to show that he was so intoxicated as not to be able to know whether plaintiffs' witness was intoxicated or to be under the impression that every person he met or saw, and not he, was in a state of intoxication.

5. Appeal and error — 1048(6) — Exclusion of cross-examination as to witness' intoxication held harmless.

Exclusion of cross-examination as to a witness' being intoxicated held not prejudicial.

6. Trial — 232(3) — Instruction as to recovery not being justified because of instruction as to damages held not error.

In automobile collision case, an instruction that the jury were not to understand they were to give damages simply because the court instructed on the measure of damages held not error.

7. Trial — 333 — Ungrammatical verdict not error.

In automobile collision case, where defendant filed cross-complaint for damages to his machine, a verdict against both parties and that neither party "are" entitled to damages, although ungrammatical, was sufficiently clear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Dewey S. Grover and Mae Grover against John Morrison, who filed a cross-complaint. From judgment awarding no damages to either party, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellants.
Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. Plaintiffs brought the action to recover from defendant damages for injuries received by plaintiff Mae Grover in an automobile collision, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, for physicians', nurses', and hospital charges incurred by her, and for damages to plaintiffs' automobile. Defendant filed a cross-complaint in which he asked for $600, damages to his automobile, claiming that the collision was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs. Trial was had before a jury, which found "against the plaintiffs and against the defendant and further find that neither party is entitled to damages." Judgment was accordingly entered, from which judgment plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

It is first contended by appellants that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict.

Crossing the Yuba river, at the city of Marysville, is a bridge which, with its approaches, commences at the termination of D street, in said city, and is approximately 2,200 feet in length to the southerly bank of said river. The roadway on said bridge is 24 feet in width, with a raised sidewalk on each side 3 feet in width and railings on the outside of each sidewalk.

On the 8th day of December, 1917, at about the hour of 4 o'clock in the afternoon, with the sun shining, plaintiffs, husband and wife, drove upon the south end of the bridge in a Ford automobile on their way to Marysville. Plaintiff Dewey S. Grover testified that upon driving upon the bridge he traveled on the east, or right-hand, side at a speed approximately of 10 or 12 miles an hour and was traveling carefully. When he was about halfway across the bridge he saw approaching him a small tractor, driven by a man named Davis, coming south from the north end of the bridge on the west side. A little further on he saw defendant's machine coming around the left-hand side of the tractor to pass it. The witness testified:

"It kept coming right towards me. I was running along probably a foot or two from the sidewalk of the bridge. I supposed he would turn off in just a minute, which they do lots of times; people will run close to you and then turn off, but he kept coming, and when I saw he wasn't going to stop I jammed my car into the sidewalk, commenced stopping it, tried to stop it. When he got right up close, about 20 or 25 feet away from me, he turned out to the right right quick, to the west, and he didn't turn fast enough to miss me; his car caught on the corner of my car kind of sloping and jammed my car into the bridge and broke one of my wheels down; the hind end of his car flew around kind of catercornered across the bridge, toward the west and southerly. When we stopped my car was on the sidewalk, the hind wheels; his car was sitting against my car, sitting across the bridge; we were both kind of across the bridge then. The left-hand corner of defendant's car struck the left-hand corner of mine. When the collision came my car was right up against the east sidewalk of the bridge, probably 3 inches from it. Before the collision I should judge the defendant was going probably 20 miles an hour; he was going pretty fast."

The plaintiff Mae Grover testified practically to the same facts as did her husband. She was severely injured, and people in a passing automobile took her and her husband to Marysville.

William Davis, called as a witness for plaintiffs, testified that he was a tractor driver, and on the day of the collision was driving a tractor on the right-hand side of the bridge going south, and was about a third of the way or nearly halfway across the bridge when defendant's machine pulled around from behind him and ran into Grover's machine, who was coming north on the east side of the bridge. He said the defendant's automobile "had about 150 feet clearance to get on the other side, but it didn't seem to get there. He turned trying to make it go on the right, on his own side, but he didn't make it fast enough before they collided." The witness described the positions of the two automobiles after the collision, placing them about as plaintiffs did. He said he helped carry defendant's car around so he could pass. On cross-examination the witness was asked if he was drunk or sober at the time of the collision, and answered that he wasn't either one, but that he had had a couple of drinks.

J. J. Degire, a stableman residing at Marysville, at the time of the collision was hauling gravel with a two-horse team and wagon. As he drove on to the bridge from the south end he saw the accident and drove to the place. He testified:

"I got up and helped get the machines out of the way so I could come on to town." He described the location of the two cars. "I helped Mr. Davis, the tractor driver, move Mr. Morrison's machine out of the way so he could get by."

On cross-examination the witness said that Davis was sober so far as he could see.

Two other witnesses, one of them being R. C. De Witt, called on behalf of plaintiffs, testified that they saw the Ford after the collision, and that it was on the east side of the roadway.

The defendant testified that he had noticed Davis in the city of Marysville driving the tractor toward the bridge; that when he (defendant) drove upon the bridge there was no vehicle of any kind ahead of him on the bridge; that when he got fairly on the bridge he was traveling at a rate of about 10 or 15 miles an hour. He testified:

"I saw another machine coming towards me close up to the center, until he got so close to me that I had no chance to get away, and he was probably then 6 inches too close to me; he was over enough on my line so I couldn't turn off and get away fast enough to get away from him; he was coming along pretty fast speed."

His description of how the collision occurred, as to the positions of the two cars, was about as already given. He said that he, a man named Strawn, and a colored man moved defendant's car to the sidewalk on the west side.

On cross-examination the defendant first stated, as he did in his direct examination, that when the collision occurred the plaintiffs' car was "over the center (of the bridge) on my side." On further cross-examination as to this point, his answers were not as positive as they previously were. He, for instance, said:

"I don't know that he was over the center; he was at the center; he was at the center; he might have been over. Q. Would you say his left wheel would be at the center? A. I suppose so. * * * Q. How much space, approximately, does it require for your automobile to pass through, taking the full width of the machine at its widest part? A. Seven feet, probably $6\frac{1}{2}$ or 7, I should judge. I don't know that would cover everything, fenders and all. Q. You came together and your left front wheel struck and locked with the left front wheel of plaintiffs' machine? A. Yes. Q. Both wheels were broken, were they? A. Yes, sir."

David Morrison, a brother of the defendant, testified that he was in a Ford machine and drove behind a tractor on the bridge, passed it, and saw there had been a wreck. He stopped and saw his brother and Strawn and another man move his brother's car to the west side of the center of the bridge, plaintiff's car being on the east side of the center, but he said it was not up on the sidewalk on the east side; the wheels might have been a foot or so from the sidewalk. James Strawn testified to having assisted in moving defendant's car.

[1] It is plainly apparent from the testimony, of which the foregoing statement embraces a correct epitome, that, when the collision occurred, both the plaintiffs and the defendant were driving very close to the center line of the bridge. At any rate, this court must so view the situation. It is likewise also apparent that upon the question whether, when the collision occurred, the two machines were both running on and along the center line of the bridge, there exists a sharp conflict in the evidence. In fact, there is a pronounced conflict in the evidence upon the question whether, at the time of the accident, the machine of the plaintiffs, who were traveling in a northerly direction, was or was not running beyond the west of the center line of the bridge a few inches. It is true that the defendant, after having on direct examination positively testified that the plaintiffs' machine was on the west of the center line of the bridge a few inches when the collision took place, was not so positive on that point on his cross-examination; still, it was for the jury, under such state of the testimony, to determine what was the fact in that regard. But, in any event, the evidence appears to be such as that the jury could well have found, as it did find, that both machines, when they collided, were traveling so close to the center line of the bridge that it would be very difficult to determine, if, indeed, it could justly be determined at all, which of the two, the plaintiff or the defendant, was to blame for the collision, or, in other words, whether it was the defendant's negligence or that of the plaintiff or the contemporaneous negligence of both that was the proximate cause of the injury. It follows, therefore, that this court is in no position to hold, as a matter of law, that the finding of the jury that both the plaintiff and the defendant were equally at fault, and that the accident would not have occurred but for the simultaneous negligence of both, is not supported by the evidence. The verdict, in effect, implies, of course, that, while the defendant was guilty of negligence, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, in the absence of which the collision and the injuries resulting therefrom to the plaintiff Mae Grover and to plaintiffs' machine would not have happened; and in this connection we notice the contention of the counsel for the appellants that contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiffs is not set up or pleaded as a defense by the defendant, and, not being so pleaded, the defendant cannot avail himself of the defense of contributory negligence. But the reply to this contention is to be found in the averments of the cross-complaint filed by the defendant. In that pleading the defendant, asking for affirmative relief against the plaintiffs, alleged and charged in appropriate language that the collision and the consequent damage were due directly and solely to the negligence of the plaintiff Dewey S. Grover, in that, when the accident occurred, the latter was driving his machine on the west of the center line of the bridge. This is, of course, a straight allegation that the plaintiff himself, by his own negligence, directly contributed to the collision, and thus the issue of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiffs was expressly and directly submitted by the pleadings. The cause was not, as is often true where a cross-complaint is filed, and the real, vital issues are made up and tendered by an answer thereto, tried alone upon the cross-complaint and the answer of the plaintiff thereto. Each of the parties was seeking affirmative relief, and the case was necessarily tried upon all the pleadings of both parties—that is, upon all the issues involved in all the pleadings filed—and hence, as above suggested, to ascertain what the vital issues of fact to be determined by the jury were, all the pleadings and the issues submitted by them were necessarily to be considered in their entirety. Thus viewing the situation as to the issues of fact involved in the action, as they were made up by the several pleadings of the parties, it is plainly manifest, as above stated, that one of the important questions of fact raised by the pleadings as a whole and which the jury were required to consider and determine was whether the plaintiff Dewey S. Grover himself was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the collision and its consequences.

It is to be said, however, that the counsel for the appellants does not appear to be so insistent upon the proposition that there is no substantial support in the evidence for the verdict or upon the point that the issue of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff Dewey S. Grover is not properly raised by the pleadings as he is upon the proposition that, in view of the asserted unsatisfactory character of the evidence as a foundation for the finding of the jury, certain alleged erroneous rulings of the court upon the question of the legal propriety of certain testimony should, with certain alleged erroneous instructions as to the law of the case, be held a sufficient predicate for a judgment of reversal. These assignments will now briefly be considered.

During the direct examination of R. C. De Witt, a witness called for plaintiffs, he was asked where on the bridge he saw any evidence of collision. The question was objected to, counsel for defendant saying:

"This collision occurred about 10 minutes after 4; all these machines had been moved.

"Mr. Carlin: There is no evidence that the plaintiffs' machine was moved at all.

"The Court: Two witnesses testified it was moved.

"Mr. Carlin: Not the plaintiffs' machine; no witness testified at all that plaintiffs' machine was moved at any time.

"The Court: That is not asking about the plaintiffs' machine.

"Mr. Carlin: That is only preliminary.

"The Court: I will hear it; answer the question. A. I should judge 350 feet somewhere from the north end.

"Mr. Carlin: What did you see there?

"Counsel for Defendant: Same objection.

"The Court: It is very evident if that is true there was quite a change in the machines.

"Mr. Carlin: How many feet? A. About 350 feet.

"The Court: 427 feet.

"Mr. Carlin: Would you say 350 feet was exact, or might it be 427? (Objected to as leading, immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent.)

"The Court: I will let him answer. You didn't measure it? A. No, sir.

"The Court: Just guessing at it? A. Just guessing at it.

"Mr. Carlin: What did you see? A. I saw a Ford and another car in front of it."

The point made by counsel as to the foregoing is that the court, in stating that the plaintiffs' machine had been moved from the position in which it was left by the collision, there having been no testimony that it was moved at the time referred to by the witness De Witt, "trenched upon the province of the jury." It is further objected that the court trespassed upon the domain of the jury when it stated that there was evidence of a collision on the bridge about "427 feet" from the north end thereof; the witness having previously estimated that the distance was about 350 feet from the north end of the bridge, and, further, that the court was without legal right to ask the witness if he was merely making a guess as to the distance.

[2, 3] There is nothing so serious in the action of the court thus referred to and criticized, assuming it to be justly amenable to all that is said against it, as to justify us in declaring that thereby the jury were unduly influenced in their consideration of the case or led to reach the conclusion evidenced by their verdict. The court had the right to ask the witness whether he was giving a mere approximation of the distance, or, what amounts to the same thing, "guessing at the distance," or whether his statement as to the distance was based upon an actual measurement thereof. Counsel would not say or contend that he or the attorney on the other side, according as the exigency of the situation might require it, would not be allowed properly to ask such a question or inquire whether a witness, in stating distances, based his testimony in that respect on actual measurements or a mere guess or approximation, and certainly, if counsel may ask such a question, it cannot be error for the court to ask it, if the question is propounded by the latter in a proper manner, or so that the jury may not infer that it is the desire or sole purpose of the court thus to discredit the witness or prejudice his testimony in the minds of the jury. As to the suggestion of the court that the machine of the plaintiffs had, before the witness saw any "evidence of a collision," been moved from the position in which it had been left as a result of the collision, it will be noted that, after counsel for plaintiffs stated that there was no testimony that the machine had been moved, the court remarked that the question objected to had no application or reference to plaintiffs' machine, and this observation by the court in a measure corrected its previous alleged misstatement as to the removal of said machine. Moreover, counsel for the plaintiffs having called attention to the fact that there was no testimony up to that stage of the case showing that plaintiffs' machine had been moved, the jury, we must assume, must also have then recalled that there was then no such testimony before them, and we must further assume that, if there was no proof of the plaintiffs' machine having been moved, the jury would not assume that there was on the mere inadvertent intimation by the court that such testimony had been given before them. We cannot perceive any merit in the objection here considered.

[4] The witness Davis, as above shown, testified in behalf of the plaintiffs. On cross-examination he was asked if he was not under the influence of intoxicating liquor at the time the accident, which he claimed to have witnessed, occurred. He denied that he was then intoxicated. The defendant called one L. P. Worden as a witness, who testified that he had seen the witness Davis as the latter was leaving Marysville with his tractor on the day of the collision, and that Davis was drunk. Counsel for plaintiffs, on cross-examination, asked the witness whether he was not drunk himself and whether it was a fact that up to that time for months he did not draw a sober breath. Objections to both questions were sustained, and referring to the second one, the court said:

"Mr. Carlin, that is not a proper question to ask. I have ruled. The witness is entitled to protection on the stand, and I am going to protect him; it isn't right to ask insulting questions of the witness, and don't do it any more."

[5] We are at a loss to understand the theory upon which the court disallowed the cross-examination. The obvious purpose of proving that Davis was intoxicated was to show that his mental condition was such at the time of the collision as that he was not able to form a proper or an accurate conception of the circumstances under which the collision occurred, or, in other words, to show that his testimony was unreliable and could not be depended upon; and the cross-examination of Davis on that line, as well as any testimony offered in impeachment of his denial of having been drunk at the time in question, were proper. Upon identically the same theory, it was proper for the plaintiffs to show, if it could be done, that Worden was himself intoxicated to an extent that he was thus rendered incapable of knowing or determining whether Davis was intoxicated, or whether, being intoxicated himself, and experiencing the usual effects of such a condition, his brain was susceptible to the impression that every person he met or saw, and not he, was in a state of alcoholic intoxication. But, while we doubt not that the ruling excluding the cross-examination was error, we do not feel that we are justified in holding that it was prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiffs. In other words, we cannot say that the jury's conclusion was affected by the ruling, or that a different result would have followed from the allowance of the cross-examination. Davis denied that he was intoxicated at the time of the accident, and it was for the jury to determine from his testimony, as compared to that of Worden, what his condition as to sobriety was. Furthermore, as above shown, the testimony of Davis was only corroborative of that of the plaintiffs as to the claim of the latter that the defendant, at the time of the collision, was driving on the east of the center line of the bridge, and, even with the testimony of Davis given upon the theory that he was in a perfect state of ebriety when the collision happened, the state of the evidence, as before declared, was such as that the jury might still be in serious doubt as to which of the parties was directly responsible for the accident, and thus have been brought to the conclusion at which they arrived, to wit, that both were equally at fault.

The several instructions given by the court at the request of the defendant, and to which objection is here made because, as is the contention, they do not state the law correctly, may be summarized as follows: That the jury are not to understand that they are to give damages simply because instructions involving the statement of the rule as to the measure of damages are addressed to them by the court; that such instructions have no application where the liability of the defendant has not been established, "and should not be understood as conveying any intimation that in the opinion of the court the plaintiff is entitled to damages or not" (instruction No. 1); "that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs and defendant approached each other from opposite directions on what is commonly known as the D street bridge, and that their automobiles collided on the center line of said bridge, and that if ordinary care had been exercised on the part of both plaintiffs and defendant, and there was room for the said parties to have turned further to their right-hand sides of said bridge, respectively, thus avoiding any collision, then I instruct you that it is the law that both parties were negligent, and neither party may recover as against the other" (instruction No. 5); that, if neither party was negligent, neither can recover from the other (instruction 7); that, if both parties were equally guilty of negligence, then neither can recover (instruction 8); and the giving by the court to the jury of the form of verdict which they returned into court.

[6] The instructions thus referred to, although in some respects awkwardly phrased, stated the law correctly to the jury. Obviously the jury were not legally authorized to award damages to either party if the liability of neither was established by the evidence merely because the court explained to them the rule as to the measure of damages in such a case as this; and a more obvious proposition could not be stated than that if neither party was negligent, or if both parties were equally guilty of negligence, simultaneously committed, neither was entitled to recover against the other. By instruction No. 5 the court clearly meant to say, and undoubtedly the jury so understood the instruction, since it could bear or convey no other meaning than that if, when the collision occurred, both parties were driving on the center line of the bridge, then both were equally guilty of negligence contemporaneously occurring, and that in that case neither was entitled to a verdict for damages as against the other. As so understood, the instruction involved a correct enunciation of the rule in such a case. It may be added here that the court, in its charge to the jury, gave a full and fair statement of all the principles of law pertinent to the case as it was made by the evidence.

[7] The complaint against the form of the verdict returned by the jury possesses no merit. Its effect was merely to find against the plaintiffs on their complaint and against the defendant on his cross-complaint, and "that neither party are entitled to damages."

Although a little out of shape in its grammatical construction, the verdict is in language sufficiently clear and explicit to put beyond doubt the proposition that the result reached by the jury was that neither of the parties to the action was entitled to recover against the other.

The judgment is affirmed.
